Mr. DENISON. I think there were about 126 civilian professors and instructors at the academy and possibly 140 or 150 naval officers when this question again came up two years ago. But of course in the meantime we had materially increased the number of cadets at the academy. Formerly there were but two from each district. That was before the World War. Two years ago, when this limitation was put back in the bill, there were five from each congressional district. So that the number of teachers of both classes had to be increased materially on account of the great increase in the number of cadets. That limitation was put into the bill, gentlemen of the committee, to prevent the superintendent of the academy from discharging civilian professors and appointing naval officers in their places to teach academic subjects. The civilian professors are confined, of course, to the teaching of English and mathematics and history and modern languages.

The naval instructors teach navigation, marine engineering, gunnery, and discipline and various other subjects that are of a military character, and that is proper. But I do think that trained civilians, professors and instructors, ought to be in charge of teaching all strictly academic subjects, and I am sure that everyone who has ever investigated this subject agrees to that proposition.

I did not intend to offer this amendment myself, because I felt that the members of the committee in charge of the bill agree with me on this question of policy, and I have understood that they had been given some positive assurances. They had Admiral Wilson come before them, and the admiral has assured them, as I understand, that he would not carry out this policy of discharging the civilian professors any further. Now, with me it is a serious question whether or not it is wise for us, who, after all, are charged with the responsibility of seeing that the Naval Academy is conducted properly as a naval educational institution, to leave this limitation entirely out of the bill, and thereby allow to the superintendent the right to go ahead, if he chooses to do so, and discharge many of the able, trained, efficient civilian teachers and put in their places naval officers who do not have the first qualifications as teachers of academic subjects. I have grave doubts about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. It is a question whether we should leave that provision out of the bill, as I say, so as to give the superintendent the right to go ahead and discharge these civilian professors and to assign naval officers to teach academic subjects in their places. I am not in a position to decide it, but I have serious doubts. I will be glad to hear from the members of the committee. I see the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is here. He is very much interested in this matter. He assisted me two years ago in putting this limitation in the bill. The matter was thoroughly discussed at that time, and the House decided by a considerable majority to put the limitation in the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was in thorough sympathy with the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois at that time, and I am still in sympathy with that position.

Admiral Wilson at my request came before the committee, just before the committee completed its work on this bill, and stated to the committee that in view of the fact there would be fewer students at the academy next year than we have this year it would not be necessary to keep the large staff of civilian instructors now there, and the committee made an appropriation for less money for the civilian instructors on that account. He also stated that under no circumstances would he dismiss a civilian instructor and replace him with a naval officer to teach the same subject. In other words, he assured the committee that the only civilian instructors he would dismiss or excuse would be those not needed because of the smaller attendance. He further stated, I may add, that there would be fewer military instructors next year than he now has, and he gave the committee to understand that under no circumstances would any civilian instructor be excused and a military man put in his place to teach the same subject.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the clear purpose and meaning of this amendment is not to prohibit or to prevent the superintendent from letting civilian professors go when they are not needed. It goes only this far, that it prohibits the superintendent from discharging civilian teachers and putting naval officers in their places.

I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama another question. He has been with the Naval Committee for a long time, and he knows the Naval Academy and was a member of the Board of Visitors at the same time I was. Can he assure us that Congress can accept the statement of Admiral Wilson in good faith, that he will not discharge civilian instructors and appoint naval officers in their places, and further that any civilian instructors excused or discharged will be discharged in accordance with existing methods and practice?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Absolutely, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I feel that the superintendent will administer this appropriation strictly in the interest of wise economy and the efficient administration of the academy and, further, in absolute accord with the declared purposes and policies of Congress relative to civilian instructors.

Mr. DENISON. Well, with that assurance I will be content; but I want to state this, that if this House does rely on the statement of the superintendent of the academy, as presented by the gentleman from Alabama, if it does accept that policy and not put this limitation in the bill, and then if the superintendent does not observe that agreement in good faith, but proceeds to discharge any of the civilian professors, most of whom are efficient and capable and high-class teachers and instructors, trained instructors—if he should do that, it is my intention to introduce a resolution and ask for an investigation of the academy and the entire administration of Admiral Wilson, with a view to securing a new management of the institution and providing by legislation a definite policy with reference to this subject of civilian professors and instructors.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is my understanding that Admiral Wilson, for whom I have the highest regard and respect—and I have the utmost confidence in the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]—will quit some time this year. In that case, will this statement bind his successor in the same way that it will bind Admiral Wilson?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Unquestionably. I think he would carry out any assurance given the committee by Admiral Wilson.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, may I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the Naval Academy, having been on the Board of Visitors last year on behalf of the House, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] if Admiral Wilson, when he came before your committee, advocated the removal of the graduate school from Annapolis as part of his program for the reduction of civilian professors?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was not present when the admiral first came before the committee, but he did not in his last appearance before the committee, because at such last time he was asked only as to the matter now being discussed.

Mr. DENISON. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to suggest this to my friend from Illinois with reference to the present superintendent, Admiral Wilson: I think the gentleman will find that Admiral Wilson is in perfect good faith trying to carry out any legislation passed here, and also that he has a record as superintendent which has not been equaled—it may have been equaled—but the admiral has a record as superintendent which has not been excelled. I think Admiral Wilson is one of the best superintendents who has ever been at the academy.

Mr. DENISON. I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I believe Admiral Wilson is a splendid naval officer; he is one of our most efficient and most deserving naval commanders; but you can not run an educational institution like you would command a battleship; the very best naval officer may not be at all qualified to superintend an educational institution; and when we are trying to educate the future officers of our Navy we ought to provide trained and experienced civilian instructors and professors to instruct them in academic subjects.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not the function of this body to definitely determine by legislation the policy of the Government with reference to the conduct of that institution and not leave it to a bureaucratic system or body to determine at their will how it shall be run?

Mr. DENISON. I think the gentleman is right. I really think there ought to be definite legislation on this subject.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think he can by law run an educational institution in all of its details? Does not the gentleman think we must leave it to the discretion of the officer who is placed in charge of the Naval Academy—give him some power and discretion and rely upon the statements he makes to the committee?

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from South Carolina knows that Congress has for years had to put this same limitation into appropriation bills in order to save the academy and protect it from the arbitrary ideas of some of the superintendents with reference to the use of civilian professors. The gentleman knows that I am sure.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman from South Carolina does not agree with that at all but does agree it has been done.

Mr. DENISON. When it has been done for several years, after very thorough and careful investigation and discussion, does not the gentleman think we have the right to assume that Congress knew what it was doing and was doing it for a good purpose?

Mr. STENGLE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. STENGLE. If we insert this particular amendment in the bill, will we reflect upon Admiral Wilson at all? On the contrary, will we not be simply safeguarding the institution rather than reflecting upon an individual?

Mr. DENISON. I do not think, of course, that the superintendent or anyone else ought to take it as a reflection. Certainly it is not intended as such.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the words "in academic subjects" right after the word "instructor," in line 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as sought to be modified.

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 38, after line 15, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"No part of any sum in this act appropriated shall be expended in the pay or allowances of any commissioned officer of the Navy detailed for duty as professor or instructor in academic subjects at the United States Naval Academy to perform the duties which were performed by civilian professors or instructors on January 1, 1922, whenever the number of civilian professors or instructors employed in such duties shall be less than 80."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, may I have one minute in order to explain why I have done that? The question was raised that if my amendment were adopted they could not get rid of an athletic or football coach if he happened to be a civilian. I have inserted the words "in academic subjects" so that they can hire and discharge athletic and football coaches as they please.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the proposition of inserting this limitation in the bill. Two years ago I was one of the Members of the House who supported the amendment advocated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. The amendment was similar to the one that has just been offered. Two years ago a different situation entirely confronted the House of Representatives. Generally speaking, I am opposed to a legislative body assuming to perform the functions that ought to be performed by a board of regents charged with the administrative duties of an educational institution. Two years ago, however, a condition confronted the country and the Congress that does not confront us now. The Limitation of Armaments Conference had just been concluded. The Appropriations Committee did not have an opportunity to report this bill until late in the session. As I recall, it was late in April when the House passed the bill.

I remembered then that colleges and universities oftentimes begin, shortly after the commencement of the second semester, to look out for faculty members for the approaching year, and I was one who felt it was not fair to the members of the faculty at the academy to take the chance of securing positions in colleges and universities throughout the country at a time when those colleges and universities had, in large part, filled their better positions.

There is another thing that confronts the House at this time that did not confront it then. At that time we were not reducing the number of midshipmen at the academy. The number was running at approximately 2,400. This year, for the first time, we are considering the appropriation of an amount for the academy to carry on that institution with an enrollment of something like 500 or 400 less than are at the academy at this time. I submit, gentlemen, we can not know for sure whether there are to be 80 civilian professors or 70, or 60, or any other particular number.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. I submit this does not stop them from cutting the number of civilians down to 50 if they do not need them. It only prevents them from letting them go and substituting naval officers in their places; that is all.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me say that we had regard to the practical situation we were confronting with the language that had been incorporated in the bill in Congresses heretofore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has stated very accurately the position of Admiral Wilson before our committee—that he did not propose to have a civilian removed to provide a place for an official. With that assurance, and having in mind the reduction that would be necessary at the academy in civilian professors and instructors and also among the officials of the Navy who were serving in a similar capacity, we did not feel it would be right or wise to attempt to put limitations into the bill, but we felt we rather could afford to leave it to the honor of those in charge of the academy, and I have no doubt myself that that honor will be respected.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In other words, we were very clear in explaining to the admiral the views of Congress on this subject, and he assured us that those views would be reflected and absolutely followed in this matter, and the committee then was unanimous in leaving this language out of the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; and I will say further there was some nervousness on the part of the members of the faculty touching dismissals without giving them notice for a period of six months. This came up after the hearings had been concluded. Delegations from the faculty came over to see me about the matter, and I wrote a letter to Admiral Wilson calling his attention to that apprehension. In reply I received a letter from the superintendent under date of February 27, in which he said:

It has been my practice and my intention to so continue, never to sever the connection of any civilian instructor from the Naval Academy except for cause, without giving him six months' notice that his services will no longer be required. During those six months he is under pay.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman that I am not interested in the man at all that is going to be retired for any cause. That is not the idea. I am only interested in maintaining the ratio between the academic and the military. Admiral Wilson is the superintendent to-day. He has no guaranty that he will live. Suppose he were to die in a month or in six months and a new man should come in. The new man would have no instructions whatever regarding the ratio, and suppose he were a believer, as evidently Admiral Wilson was at one time, or his predecessor, in the view that the institution ought to be manned by military officers. Is this Congress invading the province of the administration of the institution when it specifically sets forth its ideas and beliefs as to the kind of men that ought to be instructors in the academic course?

Mr. FRENCH. I think the department itself, which, after all, has the administrative charge of this institution, would regard itself bound by the representations made by the head of the academy and concurred in by officers of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to ask the gentleman from Idaho this question. A great many of these professors have contracts which call for employment for a period of five years. That was formerly the policy of the institution and was only abolished after Admiral Wilson became superintendent. Under regulations established during the former administration the professors were given a written contract for five years. Some of those who are interested in the institution have been afraid that those professors would be discharged contrary to the terms of those contracts. Did the gentleman from Idaho discuss that with the admiral and does he have any doubt at all about what his policy will be along that line? These contracts have been construed and have been held to be perfectly valid and binding.

Mr. FRENCH. It is my judgment that Admiral Wilson proposes to deal in absolute good faith with all the members of the faculty, and I can not conceive of him violating any contract in the administration of the academy.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want to say to the gentleman that I have no idea whether Admiral Wilson ever said it or not that he would ever violate any contract he had with a civilian professor. I am satisfied he would not.

Mr. FRENCH. I do not believe he would; and I think that was the understanding of members of the committee.

I want to say in conclusion that, personally, I have perfect sympathy with the maintenance at the academy of approximately the percentage of civilian professors and instructors maintained at the academy at this time, but I do not think it is the province of a legislative body to attempt to guide in minute detail the percentage of civilian and official faculty members any more than I think it is the province of a legislature to say, for instance, how many members shall be in the medical department of a State university who are giving part of their time to the practice of medicine and surgery and how many shall be there who are giving all their time to the classroom and to the laboratory. I believe the civilian professors and instructors are necessary at the academy if highest efficiency in various branches is to be maintained, and I have no thought that the general plan that is now followed will be broken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BEGG) there were—ayes 13, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

For expenses of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, $3,000.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy consists of a certain number of Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House; a certain number of Senators of the United States, appointed by the President of the Senate; and a certain number of important and experienced business men, appointed, I think, by the President of the United States. This Board of Visitors meets in Annapolis, usually in the spring, and goes very carefully into all of the activities of the Naval Academy, more or less in the attitude of a board of inspection. I had the honor to be one of your representatives on the board last year. I was an inspector last year. This year there are new groups on the board. It is a wise practice that the personnel of the board differs from year to year in order that a fresh point of view may be brought to the work of the academy by the Senate and the House. Last year at a session of the board the question was brought before the board of the wisdom or unwisdom of removing from the present Naval Academy to some other place the graduate school, which is a school, as its name implies, for officers of the Navy who return for special work in special branches for the good of the service. I do not find anything in this bill relating to the removal from Annapolis of the graduate school, but I do know that the Board of Visitors last year was strongly opposed to the removal of the graduate school on the ground that the removal of that school would be enormously extravagant and expensive to the Government, and also entirely unwise in that it would deprive the graduate students of the benefit of the existing system of tuition and the existing educational plant at the Naval Academy. However, in spite of the views of the Board of Visitors, I understand that certain officials of the Naval Academy have persisted in their attempt to have the graduate school removed.

I rise for the purpose of asking a full statement from the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], in charge of this bill, as to whether or not this bill contemplates or in any way authorizes or in any way encourages the removal of the graduate school from the present Naval Academy to some other place? The graduate school should not be removed from Annapolis. I am advised by certain responsible officers of the Navy Department here in Washington that the department is against the removal of the graduate school from Annapolis. It should not be removed.

I am not influenced in this opinion by the fact that I was born in Annapolis, or that the Naval Academy was founded by Secretary of the Navy George Bancroft, a cousin of my father, who was once an instructor at the Naval Academy immediately after he left college. I love old Annapolis, but that does not influence me. The Board of Visitors has opposed the removal of the graduate school, such removal would cost from $500,000 to $3,000,000, would injure the work of the graduate school, and be entirely detrimental to the work of the graduate school. I hope that the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. FRENCH] can assure us that the graduate school will not be removed from Annapolis, and I understand he can so assure us, otherwise I should offer an amendment. I know how alert he is to the real interests of the Navy. We must keep up the standard of the Naval Academy. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it does not. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] has stated clearly and succinctly the situation touching this graduate school. It was not brought to the attention of the committee that there was in the minds of the officers of the department the removal of the school. However, following our hearings I noticed in the press that the matter was being considered. One item carried the story that it was possible that it would be removed to the city of Chicago to be handled in connection, I think, with the University of Chicago. The observation made there came as a surprise to me, and I immediately took up the matter with the chief of the Bureau of Navigation, Admiral Long. Admiral Long told me that the matter had been brought officially to the attention of the department, and that it had been referred to a board of three members, as I recall, the chairman of which is Admiral Shoemaker. At the time he told me that he did not know what the board would report, but it was giving the matter consideration. I heard that it would cost $500,000 to make the change.

Then I saw in a newspaper a few days later that some one stated it would cost $3,000,000 to make the change. Personally, I do not know what it would cost, but I have been assured by Admiral Long that upon the completion of this report of the board he will submit the matter to the chairman of the Naval Subcommittee.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear that statement from the chairman of the Naval Subcommittee, and he has the matter in charge under his observation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that Members may have the right to extend their remarks in the Record upon the enlistment amendment which I offered this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all Members have the right to extend their remarks in the Record upon the matter of enlistment and recruiting in the Navy. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think that ought to be limited to those who spoke upon the subject.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I do not want to extend my remarks, but some gentlemen here could not get the time to speak and desire to have opportunity to extend their remarks.

Mr. MADDEN. I think nobody ought to do it except those who spoke upon it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Some gentlemen who had no opportunity to speak want to extend their remarks in the Record.

Mr. MADDEN. That can not be done in committee. That would have to be done in the House.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It has been done in the committee by unanimous consent.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will modify his request and limit it to those who spoke, I shall not object.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I should object to that. Each gentleman who wants to get permission to extend his remarks on any subject may do so.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FULBRIGHT, may have leave to extend his remarks in the Record upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. FULBRIGHT, have leave to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks upon the recent amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend any remarks I may have made upon this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Alabama that they may extend their remarks in the Record?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for half a minute out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on World War Veterans requests me to announce to the House that on Tuesday morning next hearings will be given to Members of the House who desire to appear before that committee; that we will adopt the five minute rule, that those who want to make a statement will be heard for five minutes and be granted leave to extend their remarks further in the Record; and that those who do not want to appear in person will be granted the right to extend their remarks.

Mr. HASTINGS. Upon what question?

Mr. SNYDER. On the World War Veterans' Committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. On what bill?

Mr. SNYDER. On the question of the modification of the act that is now before the committee.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance and repairs, Naval Academy: For necessary repairs of public buildings, wharves, and walls inclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, improvements, repairs, and fixtures; for books, periodicals, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants, machinery; purchase and maintenance of all horses and horse-drawn vehicles for use at the academy, including the maintenance, operation, and repair of three horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; seeds and plants; tools, and repairs of the same; stationery; furniture for Government buildings and offices at the academy, including furniture for midshipmen's rooms; coal and other fuels; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up station and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, fire apparatus, and plants, and telephone, telegraph, and clock systems; incidental labor; advertising, water tax, postage, telephones, telegrams, tolls, and ferriage; flags and awnings; packing boxes, fuel for heating and lighting bandmen's quarters; pay of inspectors and draftsmen; music and astronomical instruments; and for pay of employees on leave, $1,050,000.

For commutation of rent for bandmen, at $15 per month each, $13,500.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment would be apparent if Members had an opportunity to look at the language closely. It provides that any savings that may be effected or that could be effected as a result of decommissioning or placing in reduced commission or in reserve certain ships could be used in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to supplement appropriations for maintenance under the Bureau of Yards and Docks. It seems that it is a desirable amendment, because it would encourage, it would seem, the department to focus the attention of officers charged with the responsibility of the different craft upon the alternative proposition as to whether or not a certain type of ship should be repaired, and to what extent it should be repaired, and, if not, whether or not the money could be wisely and more advantageously expended in the way indicated.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will this amendment have the effect of increasing the amount that can be expended on the repair of any one ship during a year?

Mr. FRENCH. It is not intended to have that effect and I do not think it does.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Under the law to-day only $300,000 could be used to repair any ship during a year. Now, would it be permissible to use a greater amount than that in the repair of a ship?

Mr. FRENCH. I am sure the amendment does not affect that at all.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I offer to the gentleman from Idaho a little suggestion as to the change in verbiage?

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman from Alabama has suggested a change in the language. I have looked over the proposed modifications and can see no objection to the modification of my amendment in the manner indicated. The effect would be to broaden to some extent the power sought to be conferred by my amendment. The suggestion is agreeable to me and I offer the new language as a substitute for the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is legislation unauthorized by law and not germane.

Mr. FRENCH. We have already had debate.

Mr. TILSON. Debate has been had on the original amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. This amendment when offered becomes subject to the point of order.

Mr. TILSON. The other amendment was not withdrawn. This was offered as a substitute for the other. This one might be out of order, but the other was not.

Mr. BLANTON. This stands on its own feet and is to be controlled by the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the contention of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. That even though this substitute were ruled out on a point of order, it would not affect the original amendment, which has been already the subject of debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question in the Chairman's mind is this, that on the original amendment no point of order was made.

Mr. BLANTON. It was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was made to it, and if it is germane to the original amendment it is in order even though a point was made against it. The point of order is overruled, and the question is on the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $16,482,639, and the money herein specifically appropriated for pay of the Marine Corps shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as pay of the Marine Corps, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 43, after line 18, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"No officer of the Navy or Marine Corps shall, unless the President otherwise directs, be entitled to any pay or allowances while on leave of absence for a period in excess of that for which he is entitled to full pay."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, just a brief statement in regard to the amendment that I have proposed. Under the law an officer of the Navy or Marine Corps who is on leave is entitled to draw full pay for 30 days, which may be accumulated for four years. After that he is entitled to half pay for a period of a year.

We all know that the distinguished marine officer, Gen. Smedley Butler, by Executive order, has been granted leave of absence and has been employed by the city of Philadelphia. I understand that it is the earnest desire of General Butler, and I know it is the desire of his distinguished father, that this amendment should prevail.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I concur in everything that has been said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Vinson]. The Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of the naval bill had its attention directed to this matter by Gen. Smedley

Butler shortly after he was granted leave of absence. It was under the assumption that he could turn back into the Treasury his pay as an officer of marines that he accepted the position of law enforcement officer in Philadelphia.

After he had assumed his office it was discussed in the papers that no matter what his wish might be he could not accomplish that thing under the law as it now exists. General Butler met it just as General Butler would be expected to meet it. In other words, he called upon Congress to make a provision in the law so that he could be relieved from receiving any pay from the Government while occupying his present position in Philadelphia. He wired me, urging an amendment to the law, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia meets the situation fully.

I pay tribute to Gen. Smedley Butler upon his remarkable record as an officer, and I pay tribute to him upon the immediate and prompt way in which he met this proposition. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I would just like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee on what legal authority General Butler is performing his functions in a civil capacity in Philadelphia while he is still in the Marine Corps?

Mr. BLANTON. It is a case of necessity.

Mr. FRENCH. The general law provides that leave of absence may be granted to officers in excess of the 30 days per year upon half pay.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question. Is there any limitation as to the time in which a marine officer or naval officer may be permitted to do special work under authority of this kind?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know of any law limiting it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is discretionary with the President. In this instance the President has granted a leave of absence to General Butler for the period of a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that half a minute more be given to the gentleman from Idaho.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Idaho yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Hill] that when the wet crooks of Philadelphia quit violating the law there Gen. Smedley Butler will come back to Quantico and again take charge of the marines.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. That is what I had in mind. I do not expect that the condition referred to by the gentleman from Texas will ever exist, and I do not expect Gen. Smedley Butler will ever return.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has again expired.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WEFALD. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Vinson]. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For forage and stabling of public animals and the authorized number of officers' horses, $60,000.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, through many amendments covering a good many years the language touching the Marine Corps has become very cumbersome. As a result, the committee shaping the bill called upon the Comptroller General to draft language that would be brief and would cover the different points that had been covered by some pages in the law. The language that we now have is the language written by the Comptroller General. However, with a view to the orderly keeping of the records in the Marine Corps it would seem that two lines—lines 16 and 17 on page 44—should be transferred to page 45, following line 16; and I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph embracing lines 16 and 17 be inserted in the bill on page 45, following line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to insert the language in lines 16 and 17 on page 44 at the place designated on page 45. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and improvements to barracks, quarters, and other public buildings at posts and stations; for the renting, leasing, and improvement of buildings in the District of Columbia with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission and at such other places as the public exigencies require, and the erection of temporary buildings upon the approval of the Secretary of the Navy at a total cost of not to exceed $10,000 during the year, $375,000.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of New York: Page 45, line 16, after the semicolon, insert "for repair and improvement of building No. 13, New York Navy Yard, for use of Marine Corps, $60,000."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have now offered provides for repairs and improvements to a public building at the New York Navy Yard, which also happens to be a Marine Corps post. I think it is quite within the language at the head of the paragraph. Not only that, but the committee in its hearings on this bill, at this stage of the hearings, considered marine activities—

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I think that the action of the committee in its method of considering this bill, in its time allotment and in its order of consideration, has a bearing on the germaneness of my proposition. I wish to point out that at the very time the committee was considering this portion of the bill it heard my proposition for the Marine Corps.

Now, it simply goes toward the alteration and improvement of an existing building at a marine post for marine services.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. Does not the gentleman recognize that this is a naval establishment and not a marine post?

Mr. BLACK of New York. It has a distinct double character, and it was designated as a marine post for the third naval district. This application comes from the Marine Corps, and the committee heard the Marine Corps on this application.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I submit there is no law defining it as a marine post.

The CHAIRMAN. The whole question, as it appears to the Chair, hinges on that particular point. This part of the bill, beginning on page 44, deals with general expenses of the Marine Corps.

Mr. FRENCH. That is my understanding, and upon that theory I have made the point of order. I think the burden is upon the gentleman from New York to furnish the law and not an order or detail issued by the department designating this building for any particular use.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am satisfied that if the gentleman knew the merits of this he would not be so insistent in making his point of order. This is a very meritorious amendment which the gentleman offers.

Mr. FRENCH. Does the gentleman believe the point of order is sound?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Well, that is for the Chair to rule upon, not for me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to get information in order to rule upon it, and the merits of it can not be considered.

Mr. BLACK of New York. There is no question about its being a marine post; the marines are all there; all the marines for the third district have been transferred there. There is no question about that.

Mr. MADDEN. Sometimes marines are detailed for duty on battleships, but that does not make the battleship a marine post.

Mr. FRENCH. Marines are detailed at many navy yards, but that does not make any particular place a marine post. It has just been remarked to me that there are even some marines in Honduras at this time and there are marines elsewhere, but that does not make these particular places marine posts.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Without reflecting on the chairman of the subcommittee, I rather think I would get more favorable consideration for my amendment if it concerned Honduras, but it does not; it concerns Brooklyn, the Brooklyn Navy Yard and the entire Marine Corps. It is a marine post and not a battleship; it is not Honduras; it is the navy yard at Brooklyn and a marine garrison.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask the gentleman from New York a question. Is building No. 13 now used by the Navy or by the Marine Corps?

Mr. BLACK of New York. It is a building now used by the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. That being true the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous supplies, material, equipment, personal and other service, and for other incidental expenses for the Marine Corps not otherwise provided for; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters and calculating machines; purchase and repair of furniture and fixtures; purchase and repair of motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying and other vehicles; veterinary services and medicines for public animals and the authorized number of officers' horses; purchase of mounts and horse equipment for all officers below the grade of major required to be mounted; shoeing for public animals and the authorized number of officers' horses; books, newspapers, and periodicals; printing and binding; packing and crating of officers' allowance of baggage; funeral expenses of officers and enlisted men and accepted applicants for enlistment and retired officers on active duty and retired enlisted men of the Marine Corps, including the transportation of their bodies, arms, and wearing apparel from the place of demise to the homes of the deceased in the United States; construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries; and for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, $1,876,800: Provided, That there may be expended out of this appropriation for the purchase of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles not more than $33,000, as follows: One vehicle to cost not more than $2,500, 4 vehicles to cost not more than $1,500 each, 10 vehicles to cost not more than $1,200 each, and 25 vehicles to cost not more than $500 each:

In all, $8,851,800, to be accounted for as one fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee as to the necessity for all these automobiles.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Texas should have seen the list that was brought in and how much the list has been cut down.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill provides $33,000 more than they already have for extra ones.

Mr. FRENCH. I would reply to the gentleman from Texas by saying that no appropriations have been made for the purchase of automobiles for the Marine Corps or for the Navy, either, since the war. At the end of the war we had a good many automobiles that could be detailed to different branches of the service. Now, however, we have gotten to the point where the upkeep—

Mr. BLANTON. I know how easy it is to explain away a proposition, but I would like some definite information. How many have they now?

Mr. FRENCH. They have 96 of all kinds.

Mr. BLANTON. They have 96 automobiles there now, and this is to give them $33,000 more?

Mr. FRENCH. This would give them $33,000 for replacement. We had an estimate from the Bureau of the Budget in the amount of $56,200. It has gotten to a point where the upkeep is enormous and where, as to many machines, a private citizen would no longer endeavor to make repairs.

Mr. BLANTON. And I think this is just growing and growing all the time. Unless the committee stops it we are going to have to organize a bunch of men here, outside of the committee, to stop it, and we are going to do it, I believe, if the committee does not do it.

Mr. FRENCH. If the gentleman believes that these departments should be maintained as a business house would maintain a similar establishment, then from the standpoint of efficiency and economy it is oftentimes necessary to have automobiles of certain types.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I notice under the appropriations for the purchase of passenger vehicles for the Navy that the maximum amount of $1,500 was fixed. Now, why should we go ahead and spend $2,500 for the purchase of passenger-carrying automobiles for the Marine Corps?

Mr. FRENCH. That is a car which would probably be detailed to the commandant of marines.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. A Packard, too, I suppose.

Mr. FRENCH. The department had asked for two at a cost of $4,500 each. We felt we could grant this one at a cost not to exceed $2,500, and of the others only four of them may be purchased at a cost of $1,500, while 10 may be purchased at a cost of $1,200, and then 25, of a different type, at $500.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I was very much interested in what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said on the subject of economy. I agree with him and I vote with him very often, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the fact that one of these automobiles is probably for General Butler, and he will be in Philadelphia for the next year, could not the amount of $33,000 be reduced by the price of one automobile, which will not be necessary for General Butler?

Mr. FRENCH. We anticipated the gentleman and have omitted at least 10 automobiles.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Then I understand from the chairman of the committee that none of these automobiles is for General Butler during his absence?

Mr. FRENCH. Not as long as he is absent.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On line 16, page 46, after the word "than," I move to strike out the figures "33,000" and insert the figures "32,000," and in lines 16 and 17, strike out the language "One vehicle to cost not more than $2,500," and in the same line strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 46, line 16, strike out "33,000" and insert "32,000," and in the same line strike out the words "one vehicle to cost not more than $2,500," and in line 17 strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to make any lengthy speech on this matter, but when we appropriated for the passenger-carrying vehicles for the Navy we restricted the maximum amount that could be spent to $1,500. I do not think any argument is needed at all to say that we ought to put the same limitation as to the Marine Corps. Of course the Government of the United States can spend $2,500 for an automobile. It can spend $5,000 for an automobile, but I think the time has come when the Congress of the United States ought to use economy, even in small items, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLACK of Texas) there were—ayes 25, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The Secretary of the Navy may use the unexpended balances on the date of the approval of this act under appropriations heretofore made on account of "Increase of the Navy," together with the sum of $7,500,000, which is hereby appropriated for the prosecution of work on vessels under construction on such date, the construction of which may be proceeded with under the terms of the treaty providing for the limitation of naval armament; for continuing the conversion of two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers, including their complete equipment of aircraft and aircraft accessories, in accordance with the terms of such treaty; for the procurement of gyro compass equipments, and for the installation of fire-control instruments on destroyers not already supplied; and for the completion of armor, armament, ammunition, and torpedoes for the supply and complement of vessels which may be proceeded with as hereinbefore mentioned: Provided, That in addition to the funds hereinbefore made available for "Increase of the Navy," the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make transfers during the fiscal year 1925 from the naval supply account fund to the appropriation "Increase of the Navy" of sums aggregating $22,500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph that it is seeking to authorize expenditures for new construction unauthorized by law and contains legislation not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas direct the Chair to the legislation he thinks is involved?

Mr. BLANTON. It is all through the paragraph, but I call attention especially to the language beginning with line 22, on page 46, and ending with line 18, on page 47.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, a brief statement probably will be sufficient to meet the situation. Every dollar that is provided for in that paragraph is to carry on work that is already on the way. There is no new construction provided for. We are laying down no new craft. We are carrying on toward completion or to completion ships that are already authorized and are being built.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman what substantive law authorizes the change of the two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers, and what substantive law authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make these transfers aggregating $22,500,000; and if there is substantive law, why do you put this in the bill?

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman will recall that the limitation of armament treaty carries provisions that are law, under which our committee would be bound to function in considering the conversion of the two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but that is not substantive law authorizing this.

Mr. FRENCH. I think the gentleman will find that the treaty has the same binding effect.

Mr. BLANTON. It provides a limitation, but it takes substantive law to authorize a matter of this kind, and the treaty itself does not provide for this. The gentleman is mistaken. I challenge him to produce the four-power pact and call our attention to the provision in it which authorizes it.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman will recall that the treaty itself provides that two of these cruisers may be converted into aircraft carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair does not want to shut off any argument, but the Chair is only in doubt about one proposition, and that is the proposition for continuing the conversion of two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers. Has that been heretofore authorized by law?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it is not clear in my mind whether it has been authorized in law, apart from the treaty, but I think I can show the Chair in just a moment that it is one of the provisions of the treaty which has been ratified.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is finding that document I would like to submit that the Chair, of course, knows that a treaty can repeal law, and, that being true, then if the treaty provides that two battle cruisers may be converted, that is authority enough.

The CHAIRMAN. If there has been a treaty which has been duly ratified by the countries entering into it, our country being one of them, and it contains that provision, it has the force of law.

Mr. BLANTON. I deny that, and I ask the gentleman to produce it and show the Chair where there is any such authority. There are limitations in that treaty, but the limitations in the treaty do not constitute substantive law authorizing this exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is perhaps a short way out of this without referring to it. The naval act of last year contained the same item:

For continuing the conversion of two battle cruisers into aircraft carriers, including their complete equipment of aircraft and aircraft accessories.

Therefore it is a work already in progress. The Chair can not find in this paragraph any authorization for the appropriation for any new work. The opening language is— which is hereby appropriated for the prosecution of work on vessels under construction.

Then there is the item for continuing the conversion of two battle cruisers, which the Chair has already said is a work in progress.

Mr. BEGG. It further says in the law of last year:

In accordance with the terms of such treaty.

That is a part of the naval appropriation act of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question in the Chair's mind that this is proper. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 47, before the matter appearing in line 8, insert the following: "For the settlement of contracts on account of vessels already delivered to the Navy Department, for reimbursement to contractors and subcontractors of carrying charges heretofore approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to cover additional expenses resulting from the deferring of deliveries or payments under contracts and subcontracts, for materials for vessels, the construction of which may be continued under the terms of such treaty."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is unauthorized and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the first part of the amendment that I have offered is authorized. I think probably the second part is not, but I think if the gentleman would withhold his point of order he would regard the amendment as desirable. My thought in offering the amendment is that it would effect economies rather than expenditures. This language was carried in the appropriation act of last year. It provides for the settlement of contracts on account of vessels already delivered to the Navy Department in the first instance. The second part of it provides for adjudication on account of ships that were held up as a result of the Limitation of Armaments Conference agreement. It was hoped by the subcommittee that this work could be completed by the end of the present fiscal year. The department feels that probably most or all of the work of adjudicating these contracts will be completed by that time, but the representation was made to us by the Secretary of the Navy that he did not think it would be desirable that we require these settlements to be made by a given time. If they shall not be made prior to the end of this fiscal year, the Government will not attempt to escape any liability but the items will be carried over during an indefinite period and will be cared for by some subsequent deficiency appropriation act. I have no doubt that that would probably entail additional expense that would either be regarded in lieu of interest or interest itself, and that the total expenditure would be greater than if we permit the provision to go into the bill now and permit the items to be adjudicated possibly in July or August or September or at some other time prior to the convening of the regular session of the Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is sure he will effect economy, I shall not insist upon the point of order. My effort is to save these millions of dollars that are continually being turned over to the Navy Department, and of which we hear very little thereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 47, at the end of the French amendment just adopted, add: "Provided, that the President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, with a view of reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a few words with reference to this amendment. I discussed the subject during general debate. The facts are that whereas in 1916 the appropriations for the Navy amounted to approximately $150,000,000, the appropriations carried in this bill amount to approximately $300,000,000, and whereas the Army appropriation act for 1916 carried $101,000,000, this year the Army bill will carry approximately $250,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of the gentleman's amendment, but will he not accept an amendment adding officers and personnel? Why should not they be limited? They are the ones who spend the money, after all, in these times.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It would be impracticable to include men in any such agreement. One navy will use civilian employees to perform duties that are performed by enlisted men in some other navy. Discussion of the proposal at the previous conference proved it could not be done. I think that the language of this amendment, which is the same language carried in a previous bill, is sufficient. My firm belief is that instead of decreasing appropriations, unless something is done we will be forced to continue to appropriate a sum equal to that carried in this bill, if not greater. Our representatives at the conference endeavored to secure an agreement as to auxiliary craft.

They failed to do so. The treaty now applies only to ships of 10,000 tons or over and to aircraft. As to a ship with a tonnage of less than 10,000 tons there is no agreement, and as a result of that situation Great Britain has 49 cruisers and Japan approximately 25 and we have 10. The people of this country, I believe, were under the impression when we said we had an agreement based on a 5-5-3 ratio, that it meant naval strength and not solely capital ships. If I am correct in interpreting the views of the American people they will never be content to have a navy inferior to any other power on the face of the earth. [Applause.] And because that is true today the administration is asking the Committee on Naval Affairs to report a bill authorizing the construction of eight additional cruisers, which will cost approximately $88,000,000.

When we contemplate the expenditure of $88,000,000 for the construction of cruisers the time has come when we should say to the other naval powers of the world, "we do not believe in this naval competition in auxiliary craft of less than 10,000 tons, and before we embark upon a program of construction to compete with the navies of Great Britain and Japan in the construction of cruisers and submarines we want to meet you around the conference table and there arrive at an agreement limiting the number of cruisers and submarines and aircraft." If we do not do that we will soon find ourselves engaged in this costly and dangerous competition. The taxpayers of this Nation and of other nations who will be called upon to make these enormous appropriations in order to keep the pace in this naval competition will gladly respond to an appeal to stop it now.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman would not want the amendment that he has offered to be compelling upon the administration if in the sound judgment of the President and the Secretary of State they did not deem there was a reasonable prospect of an agreement resulting from such a conference?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No; we can not compel the President by this request. It is an expression of the opinion of the representatives of the people.

Mr. FRENCH. Then let me ask this—

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The reason I am offering this amendment at this place and in the form it is offered is that I feared the point of order would be made, and if made I had another amendment which I desired to offer as a limitation to this paragraph. As no point of order was made, I want to ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out the word "provided," preceding the amendment, and make the amendment a separate paragraph.

Mr. FRENCH. Would the gentleman agree to this language following the last word of the gentleman's amendment, "when ever there appears to be reasonable prospect of agreement to any further limitation in competitive armaments"?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not think it necessary, but I see no objection, because the President is not going to comply with the request of the Congress unless he wants to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That makes the provision bigger than in the last bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think so; but I know my friend from Virginia realizes this is merely a request, an expression of the views of the Congress that a conference should be called.

Mr. MADDEN. We can all agree to this.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The amendment requests the President to do that which the Congress thinks should be done.

Mr. MADDEN. But he ought not to be embarrassed by being forced to do it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have no serious objection to the amendment. I believe the President ought to make an effort to secure such an agreement at the very earliest possible moment for this reason. It will not do to say it can not be done.

If we had taken that position three years ago we never would have called a conference which resulted in the limitation of capital ships. There is more reason for hope now when it has been demonstrated that nations can agree to limit armament. When the taxpayers of the Nation realize the conditions in the world and that we are entering into another form of naval competition they will not refuse the request of the President of the United States to meet at this time in order to arrive at such an agreement as is desired by all people.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I just want to make a suggestion. I think if the reparations problem should be adjusted through the commission that is now at work, the atmosphere in every country in Europe will be more or less clarified. There will be more of a desire on the part of every European nation to meet the situation that is provided for in this request on the President, and I believe that then there will be some hope that such a conference as is proposed here would have some influence.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think so; and I think it is true that this Congress certainly owes it to itself, when it appropriates $300,000,000 of the money of the people, to put itself on record as saying, "While making this appropriation, we earnestly hope that the powers of the earth will agree to a further restriction of naval armament. While conscious of our superior wealth we do not want to use it in the construction of additional implements of warfare."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would like to ask if that last suggestion of the gentleman from Idaho, adding the words "whenever there appears to be a reasonable prospect of agreement in a further limitation of competitive armament," will give the idea that we do not expect it of foreign governments, and that will tend to make a bad impression. We must assume that there is a reasonable prospect.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman's amendment is "when, in the opinion of the President of the United States, there is a prospect."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. By using that language would it not be casting some doubt upon the action of European countries?

Mr. FRENCH. No. It is merely a courteous expression of the thought of Congress and a proof that we are in harmony with the President when he thinks an opportunity for action shall arrive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH to the amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Add "whenever there appears to be a reasonable prospect of agreement in a further limitation of competitive armaments."

Mr. FRENCH. The reason I offer the amendment has been indicated by the statement I made a moment ago. There is no doubt in my mind that the greatest achievement of the administration of President Harding and President Coolidge and the administration of Mr. Hughes as Secretary of State is the consummation of the treaty that resulted from the Limitation of Armament Conference. The greatest evidence of the purpose of the administration to pursue the policy suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina in his amendment lies in the fact that the conference was held, with the happy results that flowed from it.

Gentlemen know why the conference two years ago found itself unable to arrive at an understanding touching certain types of ships mentioned in the amendment offered by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Europe was unstable. France was apprehensive, and I recall the stirring address of Premier Briand indicating the fears of the Government for which he spoke.

One year ago we passed a provision containing the language that is now before us. The administration has been in heartiest accord. Conditions within Europe, however, have not been such as to permit of a successful conference. To-day, however, an economic conference is in progress that involves the settlement of matters of grave concern, and it may be that from this conference there will eventuate such an understanding as will open the way at once for a new conference to deal with limitation of construction of types of ships where no limit as to numbers exists to-day.

But this is not alone my own prayer; it is the prayer of right-thinking people everywhere.

President Coolidge, in his address in New York City on Lincoln's birthday anniversary last month, in speaking on this subject, said:

We do not believe in great armaments. Especially are we opposed to anything like competitive armaments. While the present time does not appear propitious for a further effort at limitation, should a European settlement be accomplished, something might be hoped for in that direction. The United States stands ready to join with the other great powers whenever there appears to be a reasonable prospect of agreement in a further limitation of competitive armaments.

So, then, the amendment that has been proposed will express not alone the voice of the Congress of the United States but it will underscore and affirm the declared policy of the President. The United States, rich in material wealth, strong in man power, dedicated to the doctrine of justice to all mankind, and with no selfish purpose to serve, can well afford to take the lead in inviting the world powers as opportunity may appear to further conferences that will lessen the burdens of war and point the way to world peace.

The amendment that I have offered, I believe, will let it distinctly appear that teamwork in this great enterprise is going forward upon the part of the President and the Congress of a united Nation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported as it would read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina will be reported as it would read as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to amend my amendment by striking out the word "Provided," so that it will appear as a separate paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to strike out the word "Provided" in his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the text as a separate paragraph. I would have no objection but for that fact.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Then I withdraw my request for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, with the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho, as they will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 47, at the end of the French amendment, add a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Provided, That the President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan with a view to reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft."

At the end of the Byrnes amendment add the following:

"Whenever there appears to be a reasonable prospect of agreement in a further limitation of competitive armaments."

So that when amended it will read as follows:

Provided, That the President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan with a view to reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft, whenever there appears to be a reasonable prospect of agreement in a further limitation of competitive armaments.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the most important question for our Government and other governments—and that is the view of people generally, I believe—is the possibility of doing something to prevent war and avoid the hideous destruction and loss which war causes and less the financial burden of preparation for war; and I venture to say, without any disrespect at all and not hypercritically, that the administration has done extremely little in that direction, and Congress has manifested a strange reluctance to act.

In 1921, when the naval appropriation bill was here, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] endeavored and I endeavored to amend the bill so as to request the President to bring about a conference of the great naval powers with the United States. The leader of the majority expressed the opinion that the request would be disrespectful to the President, and a point of order made against my proposition was sustained and Mr. CONNALLY's proposition was voted down. The bill went to the Senate. Senator BONAHR, then and perhaps now a powerful figure in that body, renewed the suggestion in an amendment which he offered to the same bill, and it was adopted; and when the bill came back to the House the leader and his associates, who had scoffed at the attempt of Mr. CONNALLY and myself, urged unanimous support of the BonaHR amendment.

Whether we would have gotten the conference without the positive pronouncement by Congress no one can say certainly, but the fact is that a conference pretty quickly accomplished something, although, as gentlemen have said here, not a great deal to boast of, since it applies only to ships of a certain character.

None can doubt that there is continuing danger, not only of the maintenance and multiplication of smaller vessels, submarines, aircraft, and other weapons of naval warfare and of increasing expenditures, and that there is little or no hope of a better condition without further cooperation by international conference of the nations interested.

With this knowledge we should certainly do no less than adopt the provision carried in the last naval appropriation bill, and reiterated in the amendment as first offered by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Its terms are not more drastic than those of the Borah amendment; it renews the statement carried in the last naval appropriation bill, and it should not be whittled away in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

If I had my way I would go much further and at least favor the passage of a joint resolution not only requesting but advising the administration to bring about an international conference for the purpose of endeavoring to limit not only naval equipment and naval expenditures but limiting land forces and armaments as well. [Applause.]

But we do next to nothing of that kind. We use our time very largely in talking about matters that are of comparative unimportance, certainly of unimportance compared with the great matter of international peace.

It does not require much political understanding; it does not require any unusual philosophic outlook; it does not require scientific teaching or eloquent preaching for us to perceive the danger of future awful wars following that which has occurred unless this powerful Nation, more powerful and influential than all others, takes the action which I respectfully submit we ought to take, but which the present administration and this Congress have not taken. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman who has last spoken has stated with substantial correctness what occurred in 1921, when the proposition for disarmament first came before this House the record should not be made up upon the chance remark of the gentleman who happened at that time to be the Republican floor leader. The real fact is, as everyone knows, that later when the matter came back from the Senate information was conveyed to the House that the proposition was entirely pleasing to President Harding. More than that, the final success of the conference was due to the untiring efforts of President Harding and his special counselor on that occasion, Secretary Hughes. An extremely liberal proposition that was made on behalf of this Government at that time by which the foreign governments for the moment were taken completely by surprise, although they finally acceded, but it is largely because of the fact that they could not possibly complain that the agreement was not perfectly fair to them.

It was, as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has stated, one of the greatest achievements of any administration in the history of this country.

I am in entire accord with this amendment, but I think the strictures of the gentleman from Virginia in his statement, to the effect that no effort has been put forward on the part of the present administration up to this time to carry the present treaty for disarmament further, are based upon a wrong foundation. It is only recently, if at all, that the time has arrived when it is possible to make any changes in the results of the Washington conference. At that particular time it was impossible to get any more, and I am not sure that there is any hope at this time of getting any further restriction of the treaty and further restriction of armament, but I would not for that reason in any way delay this proposition, and I hope the administration will not fail to press the proposition for further restriction for the reasons so cogently stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose it had not pleased the President, as it did not please the then majority leader, what would have happened?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Fortunately we had a President too great to overlook any chance to bring about disarmament.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not know just what the Record discloses as to what the majority leader said, but is it not true that in the debates at the time the amendment was offered it was suggested that it was not becoming Congress to put that in as the President had announced that he contemplated the calling of a conference of that kind, and that it was a matter of bad taste to put an amendment in at that time? And then when the bill came back was there not a letter read into the Record from President Harding telling us to go ahead and that he was going to call the conference?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; there was a statement from the President to that effect.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not think it was the offering of an amendment by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle that caused the President to call the conference.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not at all. What I want to see is some practical results at this time, and I believe that right now there is an opportunity for a further extension of that treaty in the way of a further restriction of armament. Japan has experienced a great disaster and wants to economize in every possible way. The ministry which at present controls the Government of England is far different in respect to its ideas of naval construction than any that has heretofore controlled that Government. The time is now as favorable as it ever could be for a further restriction.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Bearing out what the gentleman has just said, I notice that the Prime Minister of Great Britain has withdrawn the Singapore project, to cost $50,000,000, a naval station in the Pacific, showing that the present labor ministry of Great Britain takes the view that the time has arrived when we should have a real limitation of armament.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; it shows there is a desire to curtail naval expenditures on the part of England.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am glad to say that there is a government in England that is not afraid of the United States Navy in this sense—it is not afraid it will ever be used unjustly against England, and it has no occasion to fear that.

But, Mr. Chairman, when I originally asked for recognition, I wanted to call attention very briefly to one matter that has not been mentioned in connection with this bill. This paragraph applies to increase of the Navy. There has been a most extraordinary decrease in the Navy of the United States brought about, possibly, by mishap, but I fear, much of it, by mismanagement in the last few years. Certain it is that in the last six years we have lost far more vessels than the English Navy has lost, although they have a great many more in commission. We have lost three or four large cruisers which in some way have drifted upon the rocks and have been lost. We lost a collier and nobody knows for what reason. It started on a voyage and has never been heard of since. Recently, we lost seven fine destroyers through recklessness, as it appeared to me, although I would hardly undertake to pass judgment upon it, having only seen the newspaper reports of evidence; but the findings of the court-martial practically exonerated anyone from serious fault by reason of these destroyers having been run upon the shore.

At the beginning of our Navy, following the custom of England, any captain, even in the old sailing days when they were more or less at the mercy of the wind and waves, who would let his ship drift upon the rocks was certain to be court-martialed and was in danger of being dismissed from the service. Any captain that took a battleship down the tortuous and shallow channel that leads to the Norfolk Navy Yard and for any reason happened to let that vessel graze the bottom was sure to be court-martialed and was liable to receive a number of demerit marks. That is the history of the old Navy. For some reason, we seem to be reaching a different period, when seven fine destroyers can be thrown upon the rocks by reason of reckless speed and careless calculation of the distance from shore.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has stated that these officers were not reduced or disciplined. Captain Watson, the commander of that squadron, was given demerits of something like 150 points and Commander Hunter and several others were likewise disciplined, but to a lesser extent. This means that Captain Watson can never hope to be an admiral.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would not call that "disciplined."

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Is it not a fact that the newspapers have stated that the report and the findings of the court-martial have been disapproved? I have read that in the newspapers and I would like to inquire whether that is a fact or not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Such was the statement made in the papers, but my understanding was that the disapproval was because the judgment of the court-martial was too lenient. I did not say that no demerits were imposed. Demerit marks are trifling incidents compared to the loss of several fine vessels by inexcusable recklessness. For anything of that kind in the old days the offender would have been dismissed from the Navy.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the French amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up much of the time of the House except to refer to one or two suggestions made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] with reference to the history of this amendment.

If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] will bear with me a moment he will find that this amendment was offered in the House on April 26, 1921, on the naval appropriation bill by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and myself. It appears in the RECORD for that day. What occurred? The Republican leader, Mr. Mondell, made a point of order against it. The point of order was overruled, and the Republican leader in charge of the bill, Mr. Kelley of Michigan, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made speeches against it, and it was voted down in this House. The bill then went to the Senate and Senator BORAH was able to secure the adoption of his amendment providing for the calling of a conference. When the bill was then brought back to the House on the conference report gentlemen of the Republican side raised no opposition to it and it was adopted. Now, that is the history of the amendment. Does the gentleman dispute that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. All I wanted to say was that the gentleman at least should not hold me responsible for that because I supported the proposition from first to last.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes; I am very glad to have the support of the gentleman from Iowa, and I appreciated his support at that time, but his side of the House, which was then in control, voted this amendment down when presented here. After it went to the Senate and after word went out to the country and sentiment was crystallized, and after Senator BORAH had made a number of speeches in the Senate calling it to the attention of the country, gentlemen on the Republican side joined then in the request.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. The President, after all, called the conference.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. And did the job.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And he deserves credit for it. I am not seeking to detract in any way from President Harding with relation to the calling of this conference. He had the authority under the Constitution to call it without request of Congress, but he did not do so until Congress acted, and I object to gentlemen now seeking to detract from the efforts of some of us on this side who were sincerely endeavoring to bring about some movement for the limitation of armament before the President acted and before Congress was willing to act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Nothing was further from my intention than anything of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Texas is always patriotic.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Thank you. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made a very fervid speech on that occasion.

Mr. MADDEN. Sometimes that happens.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And charged the gentleman from Texas, in offering that amendment, with undertaking to insult the President of the United States. What is the fact? However much credit President Harding deserves on account of the disarmament conference, looking at it now with our hindsight rather than with our foresight, we all see that while it accomplished some good it did not limit the building of cruisers and auxiliary craft and airplanes. The purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is to now invite the nations of the world to another conference and let them go into that conference under our invitation and enter into agreements that will not only limit the building of capital ships but will limit the building of all branches of naval armament, so that the United States, in its strength, in its power, may say to all the world that while we are proud of our eminence, while we are proud of our strength, while we are proud of our man power, and while we are proud of our material resources, we want to lead the world in the dedication of those resources, not to the destructive policies of war, but to the constructive policies of peace and industry and happiness; to direct those resources and powers to making more things that will contribute to the happiness and peace of mankind, rather than to the construction of machines for the destruction of human life and the visitation upon the people of the world of hunger and misery and despair. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can not bring this amendment to a vote. We have a session to-night at 8 o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS. I want to address the committee for about two minutes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that my memory of this limiting of armament was inaugurated in the Naval Affairs Committee. I remember that we had hearings in the Naval Affairs Committee in the latter part of 1920 or perhaps the first part of 1921, and we had before this committee General Tasker Bliss, Admiral Sims, General Pershing, an ex-ambassador to England, and some great English newspaperman. Hearings were held along the line of what plan would be best to pursue in respect to disarmament toward limiting armament. Those hearings were public and they are to be found in the Naval Affairs Committee. That is the first that I remember of ever hearing the idea discussed or investigated. The opinions of all the men to whom I refer will be found in that report. I believe that was before President Harding was inaugurated.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman say that back in 1920 was the first time that he ever heard of this?

Mr. STEPHENS. I think it was in 1920 when I first heard of its coming up for public discussion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman recall having read what was known as the Hensley amendment, adopted to the naval bill I think in 1913?

Mr. STEPHENS. Oh, I was speaking of what occurred since the war, the discussion of limiting armament since the war.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, the gentleman's recollection goes no further back than that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 44, noes 64.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment after the word "aircraft" to insert "and officers and enlisted personnel."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON to the amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: At the end of the amendment after the word "aircraft" strike out the period, insert a comma and the words "and officers and enlisted personnel."

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be permitted to report it in the form it would read if the amendment were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as it would read if the amendment were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, with a view of reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft, and officers and enlisted personnel.

Mr. GABRIEL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment to the amendment is not germane. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina has to do with physical property, and not with personnel.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It has to do with naval construction.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the amendment as it stands refers to limiting the construction of officers and of enlisted personnel. The gentleman who offered the amendment should have read it before he proposed his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it will work out all right if it is adopted. I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes that the gentleman would reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. BLANTON. I want only to add those words. It will not take more than a moment for the Clerk to add them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet been able to get a copy of the gentleman's amendment because it is not in writing.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the Chair will not insist upon stopping the proceedings to put it in writing. I merely want to add those five words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas upon the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in the first place this point of order is not well taken with respect to the amendment being legislation, for the reason that the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], which my amendment seeks to amend, is itself legislation. That is, the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is legislation, and therefore mine would not be subject to the point of order on that ground.

As to whether it is germane, all naval ships are effective only when they are manned. Whenever you commission an officer you construct him. I say to the distinguished doctor from Pennsylvania that if I were a doctor I believe I would understand that without any trouble. You can not commission a man without constructing him. [Laughter.]

He is not an officer until you construct him an officer. [Laughter.] That may be laughable, but it is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment reads:

That the President is requested to enter into negotiations with the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan with a view of reaching an understanding or agreement relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft.

Now, the gentleman from Texas offers as an amendment to that the words "and officers and enlisted personnel." Manifestly that is not germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. After the word "aircraft" insert the following: "And in limiting the force of officers and enlisted men."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]: At the end of the amendment, after the word "aircraft," insert "and in limiting the force of the officers and enlisted men."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. May we have the amendment reported with the amendment?

Mr. TILSON. I make the point of order it is clearly not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 46, line 25, after the word "of," strike out the figures "$7,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$4,000,000"; and on page 47, line 2, after the word "date," insert the following language: "except three fleet submarines, V-1, V-2, V-3, now under construction, which construction is hereby suspended until further order of Congress."

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, under the naval program of 1916 and as permitted by the limitation of armament treaty the following vessels are now under construction. I do not wish to take any unnecessary time of the committee, but I think this is a very important proposition. There are now under construction the following vessels: Battleship, 1; aircraft carriers, 2; scout cruisers, 6; submarines, 13; fleet submarines, 3; gunboat, 1; destroyer tenders, 2; submarine tender, 1; repair ship, 1. Now, the purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to suspend the construction of three fleet submarines. Now, why so? The reason for it is that the committee itself under the provisions in the bill appropriate $600,000 for the engineering department to make an investigation to see whether or not we can construct fleet submarines that will operate. Now, does it not seem illogical, does it not seem unbusinesslike for Congress to appropriate $600,000 to be spent by the Engineering Department of the Navy to find out if we can construct a fleet submarine that will really operate, and in the same bill nearly $4,000,000 to proceed with the construction of three that are now in process of construction? Now, I read from page 591 of the hearings showing that the amount carried in this appropriation bill for the construction of three submarines, V-1, V-2, V-3, in 1925 is $3,489,000, or in round numbers $3,500,000, and for that reason I have offered the amendment to reduce the appropriation nearly $4,000,000. Now, I do not want, gentlemen of the committee, any better testimony to sustain this proposition than the report of the committee itself, and with the indulgence of the committee I will read from that report. It says—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I ask for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The report of the committee says:

The Navy has but three fleet submarines, designated the T-1, T-2, and T-3, and these three have been placed out of commission. One was authorized in 1914 and two were authorized in 1915. The T-1 was commissioned January 30, 1920, the T-2, January 7, 1922, and the T-3, December 7, 1920. The contract price of the T-1 was $1,350,000, and of the T-2 and T-3, $1,494,000 each. As to these three vessels the Chief of Naval Operations in his last annual report states:

"The performance of the three fleet submarines, T-1, T-2, and T-3, was of such an inferior character as to make it inadvisable to retain them in commission longer. These vessels were also sent to Hampton Roads, and decommissioned."

In this connection the attention of the House is invited to the last annual report of the Chief of Naval Operations. It is a revelation as to the difficulties the Navy has experienced and is experiencing with this type of craft. The committee does not believe nor has it any reason to assume that our submarines, generally speaking, are inferior or less effective than those of foreign navies, but that is no reason why this Government should go on, it may not be improper to say, experimenting by building whole units, costing $6,000,000 and upward apiece, when perhaps an expenditure of a tenth of the cost of one boat in experimentation with submarine motive power would result in the development of a thoroughly dependable and efficient type of submarine propulsion.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, in conclusion the report of the committee goes on and makes mention of the fact that the bill itself authorizes $600,000 to conduct this experimentation, and therefore I say that it would be the logical thing and the businesslike thing to do to put the amendment in the bill authorizing the suspension of the construction of these three fleet submarines until the experimentation is complete. Why, the committee itself says that the sensible thing to do is not to go ahead and build these $6,000,000 units, but that the sensible thing to do is to spend one-tenth of the amount and conduct an experiment that would show this House how to build them. I think the logical thing to do is to suspend operations. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Let me take the time merely to say that the observations of the gentleman could well have been followed if they had been made several years ago. These ships, however, are on the ways. One of them is 63.1, another is 53.8, and another 42.1 per cent completed. The committee felt that as to these three, which are 500 or 1,000 tons less than those that were contemplated and reported by the Budget this year, we ought to proceed.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. According to the gentleman's statement the average completion of these vessels is around 50 per cent, and if they are to cost, as the report says, $6,000,000 apiece, does the gentleman think that we ought to go ahead and spend that $9,000,000 until we have conducted the experimentation for which the committee is making an appropriation in this bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The three submarines to which the gentleman refers are, as he said, less in tonnage than those the committee was asked to appropriate for and for which we declined to appropriate. The committee was assured as to those now under construction that the mistakes made on the three submarines that have been decommissioned had been corrected as to that type, and that it was the opinion of the naval experts that the engines they would install on these smaller submarines would prove satisfactory. The larger type of submarines which we declined to appropriate for were intended to secure wider radius of action and greater depth of submergence.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If these are complete successes, as the gentleman says, why are they not provided for in this report?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. An engine that will function well for the size of submarines now under construction may not function at all in the larger types asked for. They were to have a submersive depth far greater and radius of action far more extensive and so we thought it best to test out an engine that would prove effective for that purpose. That is why we provided the test money for this new design of fleet submarines, and withheld appropriations for construction until advised by the naval experts that they had developed an engine that would unquestionably meet all requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. For the purpose of suggesting that there does not seem to be a sufficient number here to legally transact the business of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska make the point of no quorum?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. He does.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 25, strike out "$7,500,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,350,000." On page 47, line 4, after the semicolon insert "toward the three submarines authorized by the naval act of August 29, 1916, in addition to those under construction at the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the ground that it is legislation and new construction, not authorization.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, can I be heard on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendment provides for initial construction on three fleet submarines that were authorized by the naval appropriation act of August 29, 1916. The fleet submarines designed to be procured by this amendment are permissible under the disarmament treaty arrangement. Moreover, they have been suggested by the Budget Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has offered this amendment, and a point of order has been made against it on the ground that it is legislation. The Chair would like to hear from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to know what authorized the construction of three new submarines at $3,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment reads as follows:

Toward the construction of three submarines authorized by the naval act of August 29, 1916.

Now, if three submarines are authorized—

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that they were not authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the burden of proof on that proposition is on the gentleman offering the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They were authorized in 1916, but no work has been commenced on them and no appropriation made for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that authority still exist?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That authority still exists.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Alabama states that, I accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] is recognized.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is designed to fill a serious gap in our naval force, to begin the initial construction work on three submarines authorized, as I have already stated.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. Would not the gentleman prefer to have that $3,000,000 go to pay increased salaries to postal employees?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I will say to the gentleman that the probabilities are under the present arrangement that we may have a few Japanese postal employees if we do not have the submarines.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Would not the gentleman prefer to wait until we can build a submarine of that class which is going to be a success?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I feel quite confident, from the reports we have from the Navy Department, that we can make such a submarine. I feel confident of that because the Budget Bureau has recommended this, and I feel confident of that because the President of the United States stood up there at that desk and suggested it. All the experts of the Navy Department have said that this is all right.

Now, we will always have trouble with submarine construction; we will never get the last word in submarines. They have been having trouble with submarines ever since 300 years ago, when King James I went under the Thames River in a rowboat. That was the first submarine.

Now, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt—a capable and distinguished citizen of my State—has gone into this very thoroughly, and he made an earnest, masterful, and forceful plea before this subcommittee for this appropriation. He knew what he was talking about, and he was backed up by the men in the Navy Department to whom we look for expert advice.

A moment ago there was the suggestion—which was adopted—that we have some more treaty arrangements. I think the most dangerous thing we can do in this country is to have our diplomats get together with these foreign diplomats. We were lucky at the last disarmament conference to escape with the White House in our possession, and I do not believe we will accomplish anything by any further arrangement. So I suggest we go ahead along this line. I do not suggest this out of spiritual fervor, but I suggest this as an absolutely practical matter.

We are living in a temporal world. We are living here under force and under the sanction of force, and we shall have to meet nations along that line no matter how much we try to avoid it, because all the other nations believe in force. The Japanese left Washington having agreed to a 5-5-3 ratio, and then what did they do? They commenced to build submarines and they commenced to build cruisers. Did they wait for experiments? No. They started in on a building program whereby they will have, in the course of time, 23 fleet submarines, but no better than the fleet submarines I suggest in my amendment.

Now, we have in this country about 5,000 miles of seacoast to protect; we have about 22,000 miles of inland waterways to protect, and I want the gentlemen from the central part of this country to realize that we ourselves sent a submarine squadron up the Mississippi River. I also want the gentlemen to realize that not only have the Japanese embarked on the program I have suggested—

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does the gentleman think that if we can get three more submarines and spend $3,500,000 in getting them that we will have our defense completed?

Mr. BLACK of New York. By no means. You will never have your defense completed until you are equal to or better than any other power in the world.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Why does not the gentleman offer such an amendment at this time?

Mr. BLACK of New York. Because I have learned to-day, by having two points of order sustained against me, that I must get legislation for my propositions. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, I leave it to your good judgment. It is not necessary to have any pyrotechnics on this proposition. It is a plain business proposition. The other nations are building ships; we can build just as good here without waiting for experiments, so why should we not go along with the President, the Bureau of the Budget, and our naval experts and adopt this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WATKINS. I rise to support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to take just a moment or two to tell this House about a condition existing on the Pacific coast which I think the House ought to know about. A strip of land probably 80 miles wide from the northern boundary of Washington to the southern boundary of Oregon on the Pacific coast is the only place in America where we can get airplane material. That material is now being purchased under the guise of commercial contracts by foreign people, ostensibly for commercial purposes, but, in fact, for war purposes. The next war will be on water and in the air, and we need to do something to remedy that situation. One of the things we can do is to build some submarines, and the other is to stop the destruction of this most valuable timber and thereby prevent other nations securing it.

Now, we have renounced the right to fortify naval bases in our island possessions beyond Hawaii, while Britain is left free to build a great base at Singapore and another at Kowloon, opposite Hongkong, and has a chain of naval stations all the way from Gibraltar, and all of Japan's outlying bases were fortified before the treaty was signed, while we, I assert, are asleep.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we are inferior to Japan in the number of submarines and in view of the fact that the next war is going to be on the Pacific, and that it is going to be between the white and the yellow races, that the sooner we begin to build submarines and things of that kind that will play a most important rôle in the next war, the sooner will we begin to prepare for the crisis that is dawning on us; and I urge the House to support this amendment and authorize the construction of a few submarines.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I offered and which was adopted be modified so as to eliminate the words "Provided, That" and have the amendment appear as a separate paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by himself and already adopted have the words "Provided, That" stricken from the first part of it and that it appear as a separate paragraph. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant; and that no part of the moneys appropriated in each or any section of this act shall be used or expended for the purchase or acquirement of any article or articles that, at the time of the proposed acquirement, can be manufactured or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards of the United States, when time and facilities permit, for a sum less than it can be purchased or acquired otherwise.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph for the reason that it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill. It is not a limitation, and I want to be heard just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the latest precedents of the House and of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union are of such grave importance and seriousness to all of us that the Chair will be willing to follow them, even though this might require him to decide against a question of which he himself might be in favor.

There is a recent precedent that is absolutely controlling on this point of order, I take it, because it is the last precedent on the question. It is the last decision of a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union where this particular and specific amendment was involved, and not only that but it is also a precedent established by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union by a vote of at least 8 to 1, and it is the last decision of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on that subject. Therefore, I take it, it will be absolutely controlling with the Chair, and I want to state that that decision was rendered by one of the best parliamentarians in this House, and I refer to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.] Well, he is, and everybody knows it.

When the last Army bill was before this House the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] offered this particular amendment to that bill, in practically the same language. As a matter of fact, except as to the last paragraph of the amendment that is now in this bill, in the paragraph to which I make the point of order, practically four-fifths of the paragraph is in the exact language and the exact words, punctuation and all, and I made the point of order, and I want to call the attention of the Chair to what the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] decided:

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is my belief that nothing is ever finally settled until it is settled right. The amendment now offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has been ruled upon a number of times during my experience in this House and has been decided both ways. The greater number, however, and all of the later decisions have been one way, holding that it is a limitation.

Now, right in that connection I want the Chair to remember that he goes on to show that those decisions were based upon a wrong decision in the beginning, and many of the various Chairmen when passing upon this question would assert that they believed themselves it was subject to a point of order but that they would be forced to follow the precedent that had been set, and that they would have no right to turn aside and disregard a precedent that controlled them, and therefore the decisions, except the original one, were absolutely worthless under those conditions; but note further what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] held in such decision:

The present occupant of the chair quite probably was one of those who, guided entirely by a recent precedent, held it to be a limitation. However that may have been, he now believes, in the light of a more thorough consideration, that such rulings were fundamentally wrong, that it is not a limitation of an appropriation, but a positive restriction upon executive authority, and to the extent of such restriction a change of existing law.

In a decision of Mr. Speaker Cannon, to which I referred a few days ago, when a somewhat similar question was pending before the Chair, the effect of the language was held to be decisive, and this became the point upon which the decision in that case turned.

And then Chairman TILSON cites Hinds' Precedents, section 3935. But let me read his decision further:

What is the effect of the language in the case before us? It is to prohibit the officials in charge of our arsenals and other governmental establishments from doing what they might legally do if this restriction were not in force. For instance, without a restriction of this character they could make a time study with a time-measuring device. If this amendment is added to the bill, as it has been for many years past, then it will not be permissible for these time studies to be made. This is clearly and admittedly the effect and purpose of the language. It is not the province of the Chair to say whether time studies ought or ought not to be made. That is a question for Congress to decide by appropriate legislation. It is the duty of the Chair to determine whether this amendment is a proper limitation on an appropriation bill under the rules of the House, and to say whether the proposed language simply limits the appropriation or whether, as a matter of fact, it changes existing law and is therefore legislation. The Chair believes that it is not a mere limitation on an appropriation, but in effect is legislation, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Now, notice, Mr. Chairman, that this is the last precedent on this particular point of a Chairman of this Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It is not a haphazard decision of some Member not versed in parliamentary procedure who happened to be called to the chair. It is a decision by one of our distinguished Members of long service, who has many times occupied that distinguished position in which the Chair now finds himself and who has made close, diligent, and careful study of the rules of this House.

He is a parliamentarian, I say, of great ability and great capacity. Notice, then, what happened. I quote from the RECORD:

Mr. HUIE. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

And in deciding the appeal the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] took the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee.

Subsequently the point of no quorum was made. It developed that there were over 100 Members present, a quorum, and then the committee divided and the tellers reported that there were, ayes, 66, for sustaining the Chair; and noes, 26. It was thus a 3 to 1 decision, about, by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It therefore is not merely the precedent of a Chairman's decision that I am asking the present occupant of the Chair to follow. It is also the solemn decision of this committee of the membership of the House of Representatives by a 3 to 1 decision. It is the last precedent that has been set; I would say to my colleagues that it is more important to have definite, dependable rules, which we can depend upon here, than to agree upon something because of expediency.

I want to cite to the Chair quite an exhaustive discussion of this same subject by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], and a decision following that made by the gentleman from New York, our former colleague, Mr. HICKS.

I quote from the RECORD of January 8, 1923, as follows:

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I profess to know nothing about the merits of this paragraph. I have purposely refrained from a consideration of the merits of the paragraph because I wish to discuss it entirely from the parliamentary standpoint, and hope that it may be decided upon this alone and without reference to the merits of the proposition. It is perfectly clear to my mind, and I believe it will be to the Chair, that the latter part of the paragraph in question is legislation and clearly subject to a point of order; but in deciding the point of order I think that the whole paragraph should be considered, so that the ruling may be made broadly upon the whole paragraph and not upon the last clause only. Therefore I shall address my remarks entirely to the first part of the paragraph.

It is one of those cases where the Chair may decide either way and find himself in distinguished company because there is a very long line of decisions, many of them not very well considered; but some of them extremely well considered; and they are not all on one side by any means. I believe that by discerning and distinguishing clearly between those cases in which the ruling was necessary in order to decide the question before the House and those upon which the ruling was merely obiter the Chair will come to the conclusion, as I have, that this is not strictly a limitation but is legislation couched in the form of a limitation. I believe that legislating upon an appropriation bill is a bad way to legislate and that it ought to be discouraged in every proper way. I believe further that legislation under the guise of a limitation is distinctly bad; and therefore that there should always be strict construction of a limitation in order to be sure that it is only a limitation and not legislation, though couched in the form of a limitation.

The decisions are quite uniform that where it is simply a limitation, where it simply refers to qualifications that must be possessed by the recipient or beneficiary of the appropriation, the point of order will not lie. It is also clear on the other side that where the language requires additional duties on the part of an official, it is legislation and is subject to a point of order. Between these two there is a rather broad twilight zone, a sort of "no man's land," in which there is room for considerable latitude in decisions. I think that this "no man's land" ought to be captured and organized, as far as possible, on the side of strict construction, so far as limitations are concerned, and I think that in this case the Chair will find ground for deciding it on this side.

I refer the Chair in the first place to volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, section 3973. The syllabus of that section is as follows:

"While a limitation may provide that no part of an appropriation shall be used except in a certain way, yet the restriction of Executive discretion may not go to the extent of an imposition of new duties."

The bill on which this ruling was made brought about two very important decisions. The first one was upon an amendment offered by

Mr. John A. Sullivan, of Massachusetts, to the paragraph in the sundry civil bill relating to the Panama Canal. This is the proviso:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and supplies to be used in the construction of the canal or in connection therewith except as the result of bids advertised in the manner now established by the Isthmian Canal Commission under existing law."

Mr. Tawney, of Minnesota, made the point of order against the amendment, and after the debate the Chairman, who was JAMES E. WATSON, now Senator WATSON, held as follows:

"The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is only a limitation on the appropriation and not a change of existing law. Every limitation is, in effect, finally a limitation on the discretion of an officer. It is not permitted that this be affirmatively done, but it may be negatively done, and this amendment, while not drawn in the usual form, and therefore because of its language making it a somewhat closer question, is yet in substance but a limitation, in the opinion of the Chair, on the appropriation, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order."

On the following day, after the Committee of the Whole had ordered the bill reported back to the House, it was under consideration in the House when again Mr. Sullivan, of Massachusetts, offered a motion to recommit with instructions containing this proviso, which is to be found in section 3935 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4:

"Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for materials and supplies which are manufactured or produced in the United States unless said articles are sold to the Isthmian Canal Commission at export prices whenever such export prices are lower than the price charged consumers in the United States."

Mr. Tawney again made the point of order that the proposed instructions constituted legislation. Debate arising, Mr. Martin E. Olmstead, of Pennsylvania, well known to the older Members of this House as one of the best parliamentarians we have ever had, readily distinguished these instructions, as they appeared in the motion to recommit in the form of instructions to the committee, from the amendment proposed the day before in the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Olmstead distinguishes the two in the following language:

"While the amendment which he offered yesterday was merely a limitation upon the appropriation itself, this amendment, if I correctly heard it as read by the Clerk, imposes upon the Isthmian Canal Commission, or those who purchased these supplies, an additional duty. The amendment yesterday which the gentleman offered provided that no part of the appropriation should be expended except as the result of bids advertised in the manner now established by the Isthmian Canal Commission under existing law—that is to say, it imposed upon them no duties except those already existing under present law."

At the conclusion of the debate Mr. Speaker Cannon, then in the chair, made a ruling. I shall read only a part of Mr. Cannon's ruling:

"It is conceded that under the law as it is at this time these supplies may be bought anywhere, without regard to where they may be produced, whether in the United States or elsewhere in the world. Now, this is an appropriation for supplies and equipment for construction and engineering and administration departments of the Isthmus of Panama, $9,000,000.

"The merits of the proposition are not involved in the point of order. What is the object of the motion and of the instruction? If it does not change the existing law then it is not necessary. If it does change the existing law, then it is subject to the point of order. Much has been said about limitation, and the doctrine of limitation is sustained upon the proposition under the rule that, as Congress has the power to withhold every appropriation, it may withhold the appropriation upon limitations. Now, that is correct. But there is another rule; another phase of that question. If the limitation, whether it be affirmative or negative, operates to change the law or to enact new law in effect, then it is subject to the rule that prohibits legislation upon a general appropriation bill; and the Chair, in view of the fact that the amendment would impose upon the officials new duties as to purchasing canal supplies, has no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the instructions are subject to the point of order for the reasons stated."

Mr. John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, having appealed from the decision of the Chair, the appeal was, on motion of Mr. Tawney, laid on the table—yeas 156, nays 69.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the reasoning of Mr. Speaker Cannon applies with full force to the question now before the Chair. So far as the principle involved is concerned the case then under consideration was more nearly on all fours with the present case than is usually to be found in precedents.

What are the provisions of this proposed paragraph? First:

"That none of the money appropriated by this act for the payment of jurors' fees in any of the courts shall be available or used for that purpose unless the actual cost of the trial jury in each case first be ascertained and fixed by the court, and taxed as part of the costs and judgment rendered therefor against the defendant in a criminal case against whom a verdict of guilty has been rendered."

This is the first part of the paragraph only. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the Chair can not find otherwise than that in the form of a limitation this language imposes new duties upon the court. It certainly makes it impossible for this sum to be disbursed, or any part of it, until the court has performed certain new duties. It would be safe to assume that these duties are new because the court is here required to perform them. If it be otherwise, this paragraph would be futile and the committee would not bring it in here, because I am sure this great committee would not propose to do a futile thing. Reading further in the paragraph:

"Nor shall any money be available or used for that purpose until execution has been issued and a return of nulla bona thereon has been made by the proper officer. Neither shall any of the money appropriated by this act for the payment of jurors' fees be disbursed or used to pay any jurors' fees whatsoever unless the actual cost of the trial jury be ascertained and fixed by the court and taxed as costs and judgment rendered therefor against the defendant where either the United States or the District of Columbia is plaintiff and the defendant is unsuccessful in the suit."

Mr. Chairman, what is the effect of this language and of the entire proposed paragraph? It is very clear that the House has a perfect right to limit an appropriation to any particular class. Also that it may require any qualifications on the part of the beneficiary as a prerequisite to receiving it. If the paragraph provided that each person who receives any portion of this appropriation shall be able to turn a back handspring and to read the Koran backward and forward, we have, if we so desire, the right to make such a foolish requirement. This paragraph, however, does not confine itself to the qualifications of jurors or to limiting the payment of money to only those jurors having such qualifications. In effect the court is here required to do a considerable number of important things that at the present time it is not required to do. It is evident that it is not now required to do them, because if it were there would be no excuse for bringing in this provision. Therefore it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in construing this matter the Chair should take into consideration, as Mr. Speaker Cannon says, "what is the effect" of the proposed language. Considering it from this standpoint, it seems to me that the Chair will be constrained to come to the conclusion that the effect of this language and the inevitable effect will be to impose additional duties upon officials, and therefore "in effect" it changes existing law.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut. This paragraph does change existing law, and is therefore out of order, and it does not come within the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, realizing the importance of this ruling due to the precedent it may establish, has given no little thought to it. The Chair at the outset thanks the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] for his able argument and clear presentation of the case. The Chair is cognizant of a conflict of rulings in cases somewhat akin to this one, and realizes that in considering questions of limitations as in determining germaneness there is considerable latitude between what is clearly permissible and what is as clearly repugnant to the rule. The Chair feels that in traversing this twilight zone he is justified in leaning toward the side of conservatism in regard to admission of legislation on appropriation bills. In the last few years there has been a very perceptible increase in the amount of legislative provisions incorporated in bills reported by the Appropriations Committee. The growth of this practice, in the opinion of the Chair, is unwise and is not warranted by the rules or procedure of the House. The Chair is therefore constrained to take the view that we should restrict rather than enlarge the power of the Appropriations Committee in placing legislation upon appropriation bills. [Applause.] Approaching the point of order, the Chair will cite a number of precedents that bear on the subject of limitations, quoting from volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents:

"No. 3931. Legislation may not be proposed under the form of a limitation.

"No. 3970. The language of limitation prescribing the conditions under which the appropriation may be used may not be such as, when fairly construed, would change existing law.

"No. 3812. The enactment of positive law where none exists is construed as a 'provision changing existing law,' such as is forbidden in an appropriation bill.

"No. 3067. A limitation is negative in its nature and may not include positive enactments establishing the rules for executive officers.

"No. 3854. A proposition to establish affirmative directions for an executive officer constitutes legislation and is not in order on a general appropriation bill. Also a ruling of Chairman Towner, April 15, 1920.

"Chairman Caisp, March 11, 1916: Limitations must not impose new duties upon an executive officer.

"No. 3984. Where a proposition might be construed by the executive officer as a modification of a statute, it may not be held as such a limitation of appropriation as is permissible on a general appropriation bill.

"Chairman Saunders, of Virginia, February 18, 1918: Limitations must not be coupled with legislation not directly instrumental as affecting a reduction."

In section 3935, page 629, of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, is a ruling by Speaker Cannon, which has been referred to and which the Chair feels covers the point under consideration. The language is clear and specific, and in view of Mr. Cannon's approaching retirement from Congress after a long and distinguished career, the Chair is glad to refer to it in this instance:

"The merits of the proposition are not involved in the point of order. What is the object of the motion and of the instruction? If it does not change existing law, then it is not necessary. If it does change existing law, then it is subject to the point of order. Much has been said about limitation; and the doctrine of limitation is sustained upon the proposition under the rule that, as Congress has the power to withhold every appropriation, it may withhold the appropriation upon limitation. Now, that is correct. But there is another rule, another phase of that question. If the limitation, whether it be affirmative or negative, operates to change the law or to enact new law in effect, then it is subject to the rule that prohibits legislation upon a general appropriation bill; and the Chair, in view of the fact that the amendment would impose upon officials new duties as to purchasing canal supplies, has no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the instructions are subject to the point of order for the reasons stated."

The use of the word "unless" in several places in the proviso seems to the Chair to imply—yes, to assert—that certain things must be done before the appropriation becomes available. This is a direction to officers and imposes new duties upon them, which is repugnant to the rule. It also involves a change of law under the guise of a limitation, which is repugnant to the rule. The Chair feels that too much latitude has been given to the use of limitations and that the practice of resorting to this method of securing, in an indirect way, legislation on appropriation bills has been abused and extended beyond the intention of the rule. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the foregoing decisions and precedents are absolutely controlling in favor of my point of order, it seems to me. What could be more controlling? If this point of order is not sustained, then no value whatever is to be attached to precedents most recently established by decisions of the Chair and decisions of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

I realize full well that unless this provision can be stricken from the bill by point of order it will be impossible to strike it out by amendment, for this is a provision that is demanded by the union employees in our navy yards to prevent any supervision by the Government over them while they are at work. And any Member who votes against them will be "marked for slaughter," as I have been in the past. And I can hardly blame my colleagues for seeking the path of least resistance.

The former Assistant Secretary of the Navy testified that since Congress has been placing this ridiculous provision in our Army and Navy bills each year, preventing the Government from exercising supervision over its thousands of employees in its navy yards and arsenals, it has been impossible to secure more than 67 per cent of efficiency from the employees.

Let me ask my colleagues whether, if this were their private business enterprise, how long would they last if they were prevented from exercising any supervision over their employees? I submit the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair regrets very much that he has to rule on this proposition. As the Chair understands it, the rule is that where a matter of this kind has been decided by a Speaker of the House it sets a ruling precedent. Where it has been decided by a Chairman of the Committee of the Whole it does not set such a precedent, and this decision need not be followed by succeeding chairmen of the committee. This point has never been passed upon by a Speaker of this House. Therefore, we have no guide here. I hope some one in the near future acting as Speaker of the House will determine this matter. Thus far we must be guided simply by the ideas of the one who happens to be acting as presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole. Let me trace the history of this amendment for just a moment. The first time the present occupant of the chair can find that this amendment was ever passed upon was during the Sixty-third Congress, in the third session, when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] was in the chair.

An amendment was offered exactly like this, a stop-watch provision, and a point of order was made against it. Mr. Mann, of Illinois, an able parliamentarian, was one of those who argued for the amendment, that it was not legislation upon an appropriation bill, and among other things made the following comment. Mr. Buchanan, of Illinois, was discussing the matter and Mr. Mann interjected with this remark:

Will my colleague yield? He has probably seen the amendment before. I have only heard it read. But as I heard the amendment read, if I got it rightly, it does not require anybody to do anything.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. No.

Mr. MANN. But only requires that the appropriation shall not be made if something is done?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. That is it.

Mr. MANN. It does not require positive action. It is not a change of law. It only says that the appropriation shall not be available if they do something which they now have the privilege of not doing.

Mr. Hay had made the point of order, and soon afterwards he withdrew his point of order after this discussion, and the matter proceeded to a vote upon the amendment. The Chairman of the committee did not have to rule upon it.

Afterwards, in the Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. GARRETT, was again in the chair, and the same amendment came up. On that occasion the Chair ruled after the point of order had been made:

The Chair will rule. The Chair is necessarily bound by the precedents, and the precedent just quoted is binding. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Again, in the Sixty-fifth Congress, in the third session, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Saunders, a very able parliamentarian and a man whom all who served with regarded very highly, was required to rule upon this same amendment. The point of order was made by the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Parker. Mr. Saunders, without discussing it at all, said:

The point of order is overruled.

Again, in the Sixty-sixth Congress, at the second session, the same amendment was before the House. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mann, was in the chair. The point of order was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. Mr. Mann said:

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Again, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, at the second session, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was in the chair, and this same amendment was before the House. The point of order was made against it. Mr. LONGWORTH said:

The Chair is ready to rule. Whatever the opinion of the Chair may have been if this were being brought up for the first time, he feels bound by the precedents and practices in ruling upon this and similar amendments. The Chair overrules the point of order.

On another occasion in the Sixty-sixth Congress, at the third session, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] was in the chair. This amendment was before the House. The point of order was made, and this is what the Chairman said:

Regardless of what the present occupant of the chair may think of the wisdom of this amendment, it is his duty as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to rule in accordance with the rules of the House, and the best precedents made in accordance with the rules of this House. This identical amendment has been offered numerous times and ruled upon by numerous able Chairmen who have filled the chair before, and on all occasions uniformly, so far as the present occupant of the chair now recalls, it has been held that it is a limitation on the appropriations made in the act. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Following that, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the gentleman from Connecticut being again in the chair on January 18, 1923, held as the gentleman has suggested.

The Chair has the greatest admiration and respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. The Chair knows of no man in this House who stands higher in his estimation than does the gentleman from Connecticut, and in saying what the Chair has to say about this, he does not want to be understood by the committee as reflecting in any way upon the ability or opinion of the gentleman from Connecticut. It is simply a question where Chairmen look at things from a different standpoint. The present occupant of the chair looks at it from the standpoint that this amendment is a proper amendment and a proper limitation. Here is an amendment that provides that no part of this money can be used for the purpose of paying the salaries of officers who make time studies in arsenals and navy yards. Suppose the amendment had read that no part of the funds appropriated by this act shall be used in making time studies?

Does anyone contend that would not be a proper limitation? Congress has the right to say whether it shall be used for that purpose or not. Now go a step further and say that no part shall be used for paying the time of the men who make such time studies. The Chair thinks that is a limitation. Following this long line of authorities by able Chairmen, without any attempt to reflect upon anyone who has ruled differently, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the committee itself sustained the gentleman from Connecticut by a vote of 3 to 1, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order that can not be done in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Chair does not care to pass on this appeal.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be any complaint on that score.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the decision of the committee?

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 79, noes 1.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska: Page 43, line 24, after the word "otherwise," insert: "Provided further, That no part of the money appropriated by this act shall be expended for the maintenance or operation of any gunboat on patrol duty on any river in China."

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Idaho withdraw the point of order?

Mr. FRENCH. I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks made on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on the paragraph do close within five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if I can get a couple of minutes of that time.

Mr. FRENCH. In seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho modifies the request that all debate on this amendment close in seven minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 10, at the end of the line insert "repairs." Line 21, after the word "proposed" insert "repairs, purchase of." Line 23, after the word "permit" strike out the balance of the line and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the actual expenditure of."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment is simply to clarify the language in the paragraph. We are all very anxious to do away with war. There is one way, and most people believe it would be a most effective way, to lessen the probability of war and that is to do away with profiteering in war times, and I submit to this committee that you can not do away with the profiteering in war times if you can not do away with profiteering in peacetime preparedness. This Congress can at any time stop the profiteering that is going on in preparedness if it wants to do so. I am trying to do that. I have been trying for nine long years to stop the profiteering that has been going on in the War Department and in the Navy Department. It is easy enough for Congress to do it. You have $350,000,000 worth of the best manufacturing facilities in the world standing idle. Contract after contract is being let, rich contracts going out to private contractors and the navy yards are standing idle. I am trying to stop it. That one amendment will in a small way help to do it. It is not drastic enough, because if I make it drastic enough a point of order might prevail against it, but I hope the time will come when this Congress will take this matter in hand and stop both the Army and the Navy from letting these contracts that keep up the competition in armaments, which increase the cost of preparation, while at the same time lessening our actual preparedness and increasing manifold the probability of war. The curse of war is largely due to private profiteering before war is declared. Why not put a stop to it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to. Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia: Page 48, line 23, after the word "States," strike out "when time and facilities permit."

Mr. TAYLOR of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say there is no desire on my part to hamstring the Navy in respect to this, but it seems to me that if this amendment is adopted it will require the Navy to exercise some foresight in its needs. Now, the Navy is a cool, calculating machine. It knows at all times what material it will need, and if this amendment is adopted it will compel the Navy, if they can buy this material in one of its plants at a price less than the open market, to exercise a little foresight and look ahead and find what they need and buy accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the Chair was in doubt.

On a division there were—yeas 78, noes 17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON as Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6820) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en bloc. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendments: On page 48, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "or other time-measuring device" and in line 12 strike out the words "or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 1, noes 65.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. BLANTON. I will, with the understanding that I shall be protected.

Mr. BEGG. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that he will lose no rights, so far as I am concerned, if he will let us recess until 8 o'clock. We have to stay here until 11 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. Provided a record vote be had to-morrow, I would be willing. Mr. Speaker, I will let that stand and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BEGG. You can not get the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLANTON. Why not?

Mr. BEGG. There are not enough Members here.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I will have to insist on a record vote.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the final vote on the motion to recommit may be taken to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the final vote on the motion to recommit be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to be absolutely fair to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That gives me everything I am entitled to.

Mr. BEGG. That would not kill off the right to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order that there is no quorum present has been withdrawn.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the motion to recommit and the final vote shall be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the naval bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE PREPARATION, DISTRIBUTION, SALE, PAYMENT, RETIREMENT, SURRENDER, CANCELLATION, AND DESTRUCTION OF GOVERNMENT BONDS.

Mr. BIXLER. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution (H. Res. 231) providing for a special committee to investigate the preparation, distribution, sale, payment, retirement, surrender, cancellation, and destruction of Government bonds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF THE DISTRESSED AND STARVING WOMEN AND CHILDREN OF GERMANY.

Mr. BIXLER. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution (H. Res. 232) providing for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 180, entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MINAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an address delivered by Hon. Joseph P. Tumulty, at Orange, N. J., on March 17, 1924, on Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by inserting an address by Hon. Joseph P. Tumulty on Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the speech about?

Mr. MINAHAN. It is a speech delivered by Mr. Tumulty at Orange, N. J., on March 17, on Woodrow Wilson and the League of Nations.

Mr. BEGG. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have the privilege of extending their remarks on the adjusted compensation bill.

Mr. BEGG. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the pending bill—the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman if he will not kindly incorporate with that request a request for unanimous consent that we may also have an opportunity to extend our remarks in the Record on the subject of adjusted compensation?

Mr. BEGG. I did not make any request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] be granted leave to extend his remarks in the Record on the adjusted compensation bill.

Mr. BEGG. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

RECESS.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m., on the order of the House itself, upon the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] as of yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair designates the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] as Speaker pro tempore, to preside at this evening's session.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is the automatic order.

Mr. BEGG. There is no hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not so appear in the Record. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired at 8 o'clock p. m., the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOWELL.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I believe to-night was set aside for the consideration of unobjected-to bills on the Private Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Private Calendar.

ISAAC JACK, A SENECA INDIAN.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1629) authorizing the removal of the restrictions from 40 acres of the allotment of Isaac Jack, a Seneca Indian, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the restrictions upon the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 21, township 25 north, range 24 east of the Indian meridian, in Oklahoma, which is land heretofore allotted to Isaac Jack, Seneca allottee No. 264, are hereby removed, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued to said Isaac Jack a patent in fee simple for said described land.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION TO THREE COMANCHE INDIANS OF THE KIOWA RESERVATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2881) to compensate three Comanche Indians of the Kiowa Reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the Apache, Kiowa, and Comanche 4 per cent fund, into the individual bank accounts of Nehio or Len Parker, Comanche allottee No. 721, $2,150; Arrushe, Comanche allottee No. 1081, $2,300; and Neho, Comanche allottee No. 2322, $1,550; for lands erroneously allotted to them in the Chickasaw Nation, Okla., and for which they are unable to obtain title.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LUKE RATIGAN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1475) for the relief of Luke Ratigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

FOR THE RELIEF OF LUKE RATIGAN.

Whereas Luke Ratigan, of San Francisco, Calif., was employed in the United States Revenue Cutter Service as fireman for a period of over 25 years; and

Whereas the said Luke Ratigan, while in the discharge of his duty in said service and in the saving of human life, received physical injuries which compelled him to relinquish the position of a petty officer, to which he had just been promoted, and continue in the United States Revenue Cutter Service at the lower rating; and

Whereas by act of Congress approved January 28, 1915, the Revenue Cutter Service and the Life Saving Service were combined as the Coast Guard; Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Luke Ratigan on the retired list of the Coast Guard as an oiler, first class, retired, at the rate of pay he would be entitled to receive had he held the rating of oiler, first class, when retired.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the preamble on page 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, may I ask my colleague from Texas, who is on this committee, why it is not sufficient for this man to get his rights in another way?

Mr. LEA of California. If the gentleman will permit—

Mr. BLANTON. Would the gentleman mind making a short statement about this case?

Mr. LEA of California. Luke Ratigan was for 27 years in the service of the Coast Guard. He received a physical injury in line of duty from which he never recovered. He remained on the rolls—

Mr. BLANTON. Right there; that is what I wanted to ask you about. We have a compensation commission—

Mr. LEA of California. He is on the retired list already.

Mr. BLANTON. What I have in mind is that we have a commission to compensate all employees of the Government, and in these different establishments when they get hurt in line of duty why is not that method sufficient to meet his requirements?

Mr. LEA of California. Because on account of his physical disability he was voluntarily demoted from the grade that we ask him to be placed in to a lower grade, and he remained in the service.

Mr. BLANTON. This is suggested so he may get a higher rating?

Mr. LEA of California. That is all; and it only amounts to $11.25 a month, and the old man is 82 years of age.

Mr. BLANTON. Has he a young wife?

Mr. LEA of California. No; he has not; not to my knowledge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RUSH O. FELLOWS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3183) for the relief of Rush O. Fellows.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the man responsible for this bill one or two questions about the itemization. This man was a postmaster, as I understand it, and he puts in vouchers for janitor service and rent and water tax and for the removal of ashes, and so forth. The inquiry I have to make is this: This was a third-class post office—

Mr. WILLIAMSON. This was a third-class post office, and was raised from the third class to the second class, and under the regulations in a second-class class office the Government pays all expenses for rent, water, light, fuel, janitor service, and distribution of ashes and refuse.

Mr. BEGG. When was it raised to the second class?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It was raised to the second class before Mr. Fellows became postmaster, but through ignorance of the rules and regulations the former postmaster had been paying these sums out of his own pocket.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. In any event, if we are to take care of the ashes, I think we ought to cut off the $10 that the Post Office Department calls attention to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I understand that that has been deducted.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a small matter, it is true, but when the Postmaster General has one of these claims submitted to him and he sends back to the committee a statement that the bill ought to be amended and revised in a certain amount, I am wondering why the committee does not make that reduction before it brings the bill in on the floor of the House with a report.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I could not answer the question of why the committee did not make the reduction. I had not noticed that the amendment had not been made. But the amendment can be agreed to at this time so as to cut the amount from $364 to $354.

Mr. BLANTON. If the matter had not been mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Cramton], whose eagle eye does not let anything pass, probably the committee, having overlooked the matter in reporting it, might have overlooked the matter here.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I rise just to apologize, because it is my fault.

Mr. BLANTON. If the amendment is going to be made I shall withdraw the objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee authorized me to do it, and I forgot about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Rush O. Fellows, of Bellefourche, S. Dak., the sum of $364.50 to repay him for private funds expended for governmental purposes while he was postmaster at Bellefourche, S. Dak.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by striking out "$364.50" in line 6, and inserting in lieu thereof "$354.50."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: Line 6, strike out the figures "$364.50" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$354.50."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

UNDERWOOD TYPEWRITER CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4647) for the relief of the Underwood Typewriter Co. and Frank P. Trott.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, I notice that this bill is brought in because some gentlemen disregarded the law, either through ignorance or otherwise. They ordered 19 typewriters when they had authority to order only 2. They exceeded the authority only by 17. I am wondering if we pay this if they will continue in that practice. Could the gentleman from Arizona give us any assurance about that?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think the case is so thoroughly understood in the General Land Office that it will not happen again if the bill is paid.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to find out from the distinguished gentleman from Arizona what has become of the surplus 17 typewriters?

Mr. HAYDEN. The typewriters purchased are now in the service of the Government in exchange for worthless typewriters that were taken and credit allowed for.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they all out there is the surveyor general's office in Arizona?

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no; only one of them is there. The rest of them were scattered around in various offices, and when I went to look after my surveyor general's office I found a similar situation elsewhere.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman took care of them all?

Mr. HAYDEN. I thought I would clean it all up.

Mr. BLANTON. As a matter of fact, then, there were not 17 surplus machines ordered at one office?

Mr. HAYDEN. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay $707.50, from the appropriations originally applicable to the Underwood Typewriter Co. for 17 Underwood typewriters delivered to various field offices of the General Land Office during the fiscal year 1921, valued at $1,147.50, less the value of 17 unserviceable typewriters taken in exchange, valued at $400, claims for which were disallowed by the Auditor for the Interior Department because of the act of May 29, 1920 (41 Stat. L., p. 688).

That the Comptroller General be, and is hereby, directed to allow credit in the accounts of Frank P. Trott, United States surveyor general of Arizona, the sum of $42.50, being the amount suspended by the Comptroller General in the settlement of his accounts for the period October 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, under the appropriation, "Deposits by individuals for surveying public lands," for payment to the Underwood Typewriter Co. for one Underwood typewriter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CLIFFORD W. SEIBEL AND FRANK A. VESTAL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5448) for the relief of Clifford W. Seibel and Frank A. Vestal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have noticed in every appropriation bill that we have passed thus far an increase in authorization for automobiles. It is getting so that almost every employee of the Government demands of Congress an automobile in connection with his service. I do not think that ought to be continued. It is a question of policy. If we allow this bill for these two automobiles we would have to allow one to every field agent who serves the Government. If these disbursing agents find out that we are going to pay them for going beyond the law, what is to keep other disbursing agents from doing likewise and furnishing machines when the law does not authorize it? I feel constrained to object.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the two items in this bill are based on a technicality. The Bureau of Mines during the war was authorized to investigate the production of helium gas.

The bureau assigned two of its members to this investigation. In making the investigation down about Fort Worth, Tex., it became necessary to use some automobiles. These two men were unable to procure Ford trucks or trucks of any character and they did employ some Ford automobile passenger cars and I think a Hudson passenger car. They went ahead and made the investigations and spent some money in buying gasoline and repairs for these cars. Later on when the items were to be checked up by the comptroller it was found that they had actually used passenger cars instead of freight cars or trucks, and the comptroller held that he could not pay the expenses of these passenger-carrying vehicles, because the law allowed him to O. K. bills for only freight-carrying cars. It is a technicality. They did the work, but they used these passenger cars. The comptroller is holding these two men responsible for this account. It is a matter of bookkeeping. They did not buy any cars. These items are simply for gasoline and repairs, and, as I stated before, it is a mere technicality. I trust the gentleman from Texas will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the significance of this trip which was begun September 9, set forth on page 5 of the report, from Haskell, N. Y., and on down through Pennsylvania and Ohio, and winding up at Wellston, Ohio, on October 9, then on through West Virginia, back to Ohio and Indiana, and so on, down to St. Louis on November 5?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. These men were assigned to this work by the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. BLANTON. And they knew they were not entitled to automobiles. They were getting salaries, they were getting field allowances, they were getting subsistence allowances. They were not entitled to automobiles.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They were investigating the production of helium gas and exploring gas fields to see whether or not the gas in those fields would make helium gas.

And replying further to the gentleman from Texas, I will say this, that if this was a Ford truck or any other truck there would be no question about it, but by using passenger-carrying vehicles because they could not get trucks, it caused the comptroller to hold up this claim.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to our distinguished friend from Oklahoma who did not know that peyote was made from the cactus—

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I knew that; but the gentleman from Texas, living in a peyote field, did not know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. No; it was just the reverse. I want to say to him that I happen to know more about Petrolia, Tex., than he does. There is a boulevard running from Fort Worth, Tex., to Petrolia where these men were then operating and there were jitney cars running back and forth almost every hour and they could have used them if they had wanted to do so.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Do these jitneys take freight?

Mr. BLANTON. They take anything that will go in a jitney.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I never saw one that would.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the gentleman has not had much experience with jitneys in Massachusetts. He usually rides in a limousine.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is just one continual encroachment upon the Government after another. I hate to object to these matters. I know the attitude it places me in. I can see about five or six Members here who have no bills on the calendar. There are but five or six who have not bills on the calendar. Every other man has a bill on this calendar; and he can not object to any of them, because he knows if he did everybody else would object to his, and therefore it puts the work of objecting on the four or five here to make these objections. I realize that, and that it inculcates a somewhat unfriendly feeling from authors of bills when I object. But these bills ought to stop. My colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK] this afternoon tried to stop the granting of some of the automobiles but could not do it. I hate to object, but I do object. The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

ELIZABETH THORNTON, FOSTER MOTHER OF EDWARD SHORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3386) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay war-risk insurance to Elizabeth Thornton, foster mother of Edward Short.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know about the merits of this bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I would be glad to tell the gentleman. Elizabeth Thornton and her husband live in Chicago. Years ago they adopted into their family a foundling boy. They cared for him and they educated him. The war came on and the boy enlisted. He took out Government insurance, and, not having any next of kin, he made the insurance payable to himself. He was killed in France.

Mr. WINGO. It is just a question, then, of a foster parent where there had not been a legal adoption?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is the only question. General Hines does not object.

Mr. WINGO. I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Elizabeth Thornton, foster mother of Edward Short, formerly a member of Company B, One hundred and thirty-second Regiment United States Infantry, the sum of $10,000 in 240 installments, the first payment to commence as of the date of the death of the said Edward Short, as is provided in the war risk insurance act, and upon the death of the said Elizabeth Thornton all payments shall cease.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CANCELLATION OF ALLOTMENT OF LAND MADE TO MARY CRANE, ETC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3900) to cancel an allotment of land made to Mary Crane or Ho-tah-kah-win-kaw, a deceased Indian, embracing land within the Winnebago Indian Reservation, in Nebraska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are the merits of this bill?

Mr. SNYDER. I will say to the gentleman that the merits are these: This is an old Indian woman who died a number of years ago. She had no heirs, and under the law, after a search for heirs, the property or interest can be turned back into the funds of the tribe. That is what this proposition does here.

Mr. WINGO. The effect of it would be practically to make the tribe the heir of this old woman?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; and there is another bill following of the same identical nature.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to say that while this bill is being considered, the one following is of exactly the same nature.

Mr. WINGO. Then the legal effect of her leaving no heirs would be that the property goes to the tribe?

Mr. SNYDER. We passed a law which gave the right to do this after a search by the Secretary of the Interior, and the two bills following are exactly the same.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, this bill was presented by me, and I suppose it is taken for granted I know something about it. I never had any acquaintance with Ho-tah-kah-win-kaw during her lifetime, but I have conversed with members of my committee, and I rely upon their knowledge of the situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cancel the restricted fee patent issued to Mary Crane, or Ho-tah-kah-win-kaw, deceased Winnebago allottee No. 43 on the Winnebago Reservation in Nebraska, embracing the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 29, township 26 north, range 9 east of the sixth postmeridian in Nebraska, containing 40 acres; and to thereupon restore the land involved to the status of tribal property of the Winnebago Indian Reservation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CANCELLATION OF ALLOTMENTS TO RICHARD BELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3900) to cancel two allotments made to Richard Bell, deceased, embracing land within the Round Valley Indian Reservation in California.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I have been here just seven years; that is not long; but this is the first time I ever saw the House begin the wholesale cancellation of Indian holdings. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] seems to be responsible for it.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Oh, no. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cancel two certain trust patents issued to Richard Bell, deceased, Round Valley allottee, Nos. 604 and 662, on the Round Valley Indian Reservation in California, embracing lands described as lot 13, in section 2, township 22 north, range 13 west of Mount Diablo meridian, containing 10 acres, for which a trust patent was issued as of date of April 15, 1895; also the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter and the north half of the north half of the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter of section 21, township 23 north, range 13 west of the Mount Diablo meridian, in California, containing 50 acres, for which a trust patent was issued on December 22, 1910; and to thereupon restore the lands involved to the status of tribal property of the Round Valley Indian Reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order on the bill. There are two gentlemen from Nebraska and both named "Howard." Something must be wrong with the report.

Mr. SNYDER. Nothing is wrong with the report. The bill was introduced regularly by the gentleman from Nebraska. He must have introduced it.

Mr. BLANTON. He is one of the soberest men in the House.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. It is quite likely that that is the kind of bill I introduced.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee [Mr. SNYDER] introduced this bill, and it was reported by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LONG ISLAND RAILROAD CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1823) for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Long Island Railroad Co. against the United States for damages alleged to have been sustained by said railroad company's dock, vessels, and marine equipment at Whitestone Landing, N. Y., on the 11th day of December, 1940, as a result of swells caused by the alleged negligent operation of the United States destroyer Broome at an excessive rate of speed, may be sued for by said company in the United States District Court of the eastern district of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter judgment or decree for the amount of such damages, including interest and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the Long Island Railroad Co., or against the Long Island Railroad Co. in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, lines 3 and 4, after the word "damages" on line 3, strike out the words "including interest."

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], who has reported this bill, how much is involved?

Mr. UNDERHILL. There is a difference in the amount which the Navy Department seems to think is sufficient and the amount which the Long Island Railroad Co. claimed; and so, following the usual practice of the committee where there is a dispute, we referred this matter to an admiralty court.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a difference of $1,825?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not quite that.

Mr. BLANTON. How much is the whole claim?

Mr. UNDERHILL. The whole claim is $1,825, and the Navy Department offered $651.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts has investigated the matter and the gentleman thinks it all right?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have; yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman's reason for not sending it to the Court of Claims is that you want to send it to an admiralty court?

Mr. UNDERHILL. We want to send it to an admiralty court as the court to which all these admiralty claims are referred, rather than to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WINGO. I may be in error, but I was under the impression that we sent claims against the Government to the Court of Claims instead of the district admiralty court.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is the usual practice of the committee and has been for years.

Mr. WINGO. That is, to send out admiralty cases to admiralty courts and not to the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House rule with reference to smoking be suspended for three hours. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not in order.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. We are suspending the Constitution of the United States here to-night. I do not see why we should not do that. I ask unanimous consent that the rule be suspended.

A MEMBER. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I did not suppose there were enough of us here to constitute the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may speak out of order.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman from Nebraska want time?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. No; I want to smoke. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, is it bill No. 12 on the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. No. 12 will be reported.

FANNIE M. HIGGINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1860) for the relief of Fannie M. Higgins.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on page 18 of the report I notice that the department refuses to O. K. this bill.

Mr. BOX. That is a very usual procedure in the War Department when it involves some irregularity in the handling of the men.

Mr. BEGG. Is it not a fact that there is some question about this man being killed? There is no question about the fact that he was struck by an automobile, but is there not reasonable ground to doubt that the death was due to the accident?

Mr. BOX. The committee found, and the gentlemen on the subcommittee especially considering the case found, that by a very clear preponderance of evidence the facts show that the deceased was in the best kind of health and worked 215 days in a year and was earning over $200 a month, living and working out of doors.

He had had some years before some symptoms of tuberculosis; those symptoms had been arrested, and the man had continued for some years working, as has been stated. He received this injury, an injury in the chest, a broken leg, and other injuries. He was then confined in a hospital for some time, languished there, was shut in, became debilitated, and lost the fine health he had enjoyed before, and the man died. The tuberculosis developed some months after his injury and after he had been confined in the hospital in a debilitated condition.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman has practically stated what is in the report, which I have gone over carefully, I think. Will the gentleman answer this question, or is he in a position to answer it? Was the attention of the Committee on Claims, or whoever introduced this bill, called to this particular thing by some lawyer, some claim attorney, or was it by the widow?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let me answer that. The matter was brought to my attention soon after I came to Congress by the widow of this man. I had not known him, and I only know she is a very excellent woman—an old woman who lives in this neighborhood.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman know whether any attorney is going to collect a fee out of this if it is granted?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I do not know who the attorney is, but I see the report limits the amount of any charge that an attorney may make.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to ask the gentleman who is responsible for this bill whether he would be willing to accept an amendment which has to do with the amount of money that an attorney may collect?

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman read the amendment proposed in the bill?

Mr. BEGG. I have it right before me, and under that amendment a man can violate the provisions of a bill, pay the fine of $1, and get off with it.

Mr. BOX. What amendment would the gentleman propose?

Mr. BEGG. An amendment striking out "exceeding $1,000" and substituting "not less than $300 nor more than $2,000."

Mr. BOX. That amendment is acceptable.

Mr. CRAMTON. Before we get too far on that I would like to call attention to another amendment that is probably more important.

Mr. BLANTON. And I want to call attention to something that is even more important than that, which will dispose of the bill without amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. What I have read of the report leads me to the conclusion that we ought not to consider anywhere near as large an amount of money under the conditions in this case. I do not know just what rules the Committee on Claims has in fixing the value of human life or the amount that the Government should pay.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think it is just as well that the House should know in the beginning that the Committee on Claims has adopted the general proposition—and I do not think we deviated from it last session nor do we propose to deviate from it this session—of referring all claims for personal injuries to the Workmen's Compensation Commission which carries on the business of insuring Government employees. We take the table of rates, the actuary's table of rates, the rates laid down for injuries to Government employees, and apply them to private citizens or citizens in private life who are injured through the negligence of Government employees.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand the gentleman, the committee does not really refer the matter to the commission, but the committee takes the commission's table of rates and tries to figure them out itself, and I am afraid the committee does not know how to handle the table of rates.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There has not been a case that the committee has figured out; every case has been referred to the commission.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I want to suggest it would be very interesting if the report of the commission could be carried in the committee's report.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman defer that for a moment, because I should like to bring this to the attention of the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. I think when I call the gentleman's attention to some facts about this bill, he will not want it to go through.

Mr. CRAMTON. Just a minute. This applies to the program of the committee generally. I have in my hand H. R. 3504, which we come to later on the calendar and in which I have not the slightest interest personally; but it proposes to give for a man $3,000 who had been some 30 years in the Government service, an assistant engineer, who was killed without any fault on his part and in the line of duty, when he was in health and between 50 and 60 years of age, with a wife and several children, while in this case a man who was 60 years of age, who was a private citizen, was tubercular, and who was partly at fault, as the Judge Advocate General of the Army holds, is to receive $5,000, according to the proposal of the committee; so it would seem to me something went wrong with that table of logarithms.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The table of rates of the Workmen's Compensation Commission allows $5,000 for death, but when a Member of the House introduces a bill asking for $3,000 it is not within the province of this committee to raise it $2,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I think it is in the province of the committee, when they are sitting as a court of equity, to do equity regardless of some underestimation of a Member of Congress as to the generosity of the committee.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, to make a statement. There are two big principles and policies involved in this bill. Until five years ago, when the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDWARDS] became chairman, and until our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] became a member and brought new policies into the Committee on Claims, this Government did not pay losses by reason of torts committed by employees of this Government. There is not a lawyer in this House who will get up and contend that there is any law that makes the Government responsible for a tort.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. So this is merely a gratuity. There are cases galore in the records of the Congress where Government employees have caused the death of individuals under the most extreme circumstances of gross negligence and not a dollar of damages has been paid. I want to call attention to the three cases that came from San Antonio, well-known cases, that were pending before this House for years and pending from the district of my colleague from Texas [Mr. WUTZBACH]; and Congress after Congress turned them down. I want to call attention to the cases from Houston, Tex., in the district of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNETT], where a bunch of colored soldiers became drunk and ran rampant and went up and down the streets of Houston with bayonets and rifles and shot people down like they were dogs and stuck their bayonets into the stomachs of little girls and women and killed a number of them and wounded many. About 30 of them were convicted for those crimes, but not a dollar has been paid to any of those individual victims or to the relatives of the ones thus murdered, and not a bill is on this calendar to pay one of them.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Do you think that is right and is justice on the part of the Government and Congress?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but the Government ought to pay them all and ought not to wait until a man gets hurt here on the streets of Washington, in front of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, when Adjutant General Crowder in his report says that the man hurt was guilty of contributory negligence, if you please, and then pay him. General Crowder says the man who ran over this party was guilty of no negligence at all, but that the man who was hurt was guilty of contributory negligence, and he holds that the Government is not responsible at all.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, we do not arrive at justice between parties in cases like this in a court or in a deliberative assembly where we are trying to find out the right of cases by allowing an injustice that has occurred in other cases or may have occurred in other cases to defeat justice in this case. The facts in this case are that a hale, productive, vigorous, active man—it is true he was 60 years old—earning $2,000 a year—

Mr. BLANTON. I am willing to pay them if you will pay them all.

Mr. BOX. This committee can not pay them all at one time. We are trying to do the right thing, case by case.

Mr. BLANTON. None of these cases are from my district.

Mr. BULWINKLE. How can we do what you suggest when there is no bill pending?

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed—

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield first to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Let me suggest this to my friend from Texas: Assuming that what the gentleman says is true, and it is true, we ought to pay them all. The Government only a few years ago adopted what I think is a correct rule. The gentleman says there is not any law—

Mr. BLANTON. There is a moral law, of course.

Mr. WINGO. I want to suggest this, and I am trying to appeal to what I think the gentleman really has back of the objection he has made: There is a higher law than any mere statute, and I feel sure that the gentleman feels, as I have felt many times, that it is a disgrace for a great and powerful and wealthy Government to escape a liability that any citizen or corporation in the land would have to meet in the courts of the country for the same acts.

These people are dependent solely upon the conscience of Congress to meet the obligations of that moral law. I think the cases cited from Texas are an outrage, but because we have failed to do justice in those cases shall we deny justice in this case? And if the gentleman representing the districts in which these unfortunate victims or their relatives live will introduce bills asking for relief, I am sure that upon a proper showing of facts this House will grant relief.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. But let us at least respond in this small measure to this old woman who has lost her husband and helpmate through no negligence of his own, but because, forsooth, a driver, who sounds no horn, running recklessly, as we know they do—

Mr. BOX. He did not know he had hit him until he had dragged his victim 50 feet.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, my God; can not a great Government meet its moral obligations when it knows the same facts would cause any jury in the land to make any private corporation respond in damages to the extent of more than any $5,000? I beg the gentleman not to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I agree with what the gentleman from Arkansas has said, but I want this House to consider this as a precedent for the cases I have mentioned and at least 20 others in other States that I had cognizance of when I was on this committee. I am going to help my colleagues from those districts to get these bills before this committee next week, and I want to see them here the next time we take up the private calendar.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will yield, I reported in the Claims Committee one of the bills the gentleman refers to with a favorable report.

Mr. BLANTON. Good; I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I know that an appeal such as just has been made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Wingo] is very affecting. It is always fine to think that we can pay liberally with other people's money, but I want to read you a little from the report, because I am not going to permit my feelings to be run away with here and establish precedents and put unnecessary burdens on the Treasury. The report of the Acting Secretary of War says:

In connection with the case of relief for Mrs. Fannie M. Higgins, the attached papers indicate very clearly that Mr. Higgins was partially responsible for the accident—

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I want to ask the gentleman as a lawyer if he is going to conclude adversely to this claimant on conclusions reached by an official in the office, on a few official reports presented to him by men who must protect themselves from imputation of wrong, as against an array of facts not presented by any counsel for the claimant, but carefully examined and considered by the committee?

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman's question has not anything whatever to do with this case that I can see, with all due respect. In the first place the Acting Secretary of War has nothing to defend himself against. He is not responsible, and if the Congress does not see fit to follow the recommendations of the departments charged with responsibility in matters pertaining to administration, we should certainly have a very clear showing of facts to justify our overruling the report. As I tried to call to the attention of gentlemen, the facts in this case are against the gentleman's contention. The finding of the court that was convened in the Army was to the effect that the deceased, who did not die for a number of months and then died of tuberculosis, was at fault, that the driver was not at fault.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am going to insist that I be permitted to make a connected statement.

Mr. BOX. I wanted to ask—

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, just wait until I have made a statement, and then the gentleman may not have to ask me so much. And I want to be courteous. The finding of the court was that the deceased was at fault and that the driver of the car was not at fault, but the officer who reviewed the finding, General Crowder, said:

The board has found these facts and has concluded that Private Roundtree was not at fault, and that Mr. Higgins was at fault but recommends that "if there are funds available Mr. Higgins be reimbursed for expenses incurred for medical attendance and for wages lost on account of accident, provided the said charges are reasonable." In the finding that Mr. Higgins was negligent in crossing the street in the manner he did, and having seen the approaching auto, took no further notice of it but proceeded across the street, this office concurs. In the finding that Private Roundtree was not negligent this office does not concur. The weather and existing circumstances at the time the accident occurred—that is, the darkness, rain obscuring the wind shield, and the light from the approaching street car blinding him—put upon Roundtree, an experienced driver, the burden of exercising extreme care, which, from all the facts stated in the papers, he did not do.

Further, the driver of the bread wagon, who was an impartial witness, does not corroborate the story of the claimant as to the degree of negligence on the part of the driver. He is about the only impartial witness there was.

The Adjutant General indorses the idea that there was negligence but suggests that there be some recompense. I have no objection to that. I think it is fair to make some recompense, but with this showing, that this man did have tuberculosis, that he died of tuberculosis—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object to such a large finding as the committee makes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. BOX. I want an opportunity to make a statement.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BOX. That is, when the gentleman from Michigan gets through.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to suggest to the gentleman, if it is agreeable, that there be a reduction in the sum, but the amount of $5,000 is out of proportion in view of the circumstances of the case.

Mr. BOX. Would the gentleman permit a statement as to the facts after they were found on thorough investigation of all of the facts?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have read the report.

Mr. BOX. The committee can not report all of the evidence, the gentleman understands. The gentleman also understands that the committee that investigates these cases tries to approach them without partiality, guided by as strong a desire to protect the Public Treasury as our colleagues and Members of the House are guided by. The facts in this case are that the deceased was a man earning $2,000 a year, in fine health, contributing what he earned to the welfare of his aged wife, working 315 or 320 days of the year, putting in overtime. He had had tuberculosis in a very incipient stage, years before, it is true. That was wholly arrested and he was a strong, hale man. He was going to his work that morning before good light. He started across Fourteenth Street, going west. As he stepped into the street he looked to his left. Some distance down the street to his left he saw the light of an approaching automobile. He went on across the path of that automobile and reached a place of safety in the street, out of its path. The automobile proceeded on up its way behind him, just as they do up the street after the gentleman crosses, every time he crosses it. While he was standing by or between the street car tracks to take a street car, to carry him to his work, another vehicle drove into a street nearby, perhaps the one that he had come out of and suddenly appeared near the driver of the automobile that had injured him.

Mr. EDMONDS rose.

Mr. BOX. If the gentleman will just wait a moment, I want to state the facts as we obtained them from a large number of affidavits after very careful inquiry. Then I shall be glad to yield, if I have the time. Then the automobile driven by Private Rountree, the morning being dark and foggy, he keeping no lookout, sounding no horn, suddenly turned to the left out of its path. The deceased had gotten out of the place of danger where he would have been if he had stopped in front of the approaching automobile. As he stood there ready to catch the car coming down his way, the man driving the machine who was coming up the street, keeping no lookout, driving fast, suddenly turned out of his course to the left and struck him and dragged him 40 or 50 feet, ran over him and broke his leg and mangled him.

And your committee is no more anxious to help this particular man than anybody else, just merely trying to do the right thing, and your committee has no doubt that the man was injured without any fault on his part, notwithstanding any conclusion that might have been reached up in the office, and that it caused that man's death. It is part of the history of tuberculosis that a man of good constitution by living out of doors, as the doctors say this man did, working outside, taking exercise and taking care of himself, the man had the promise of a long and productive life. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Referring back to where he was waiting for the street car, is it not a fact now—I shall not object to the bill but I think it well enough to get it in the Record—is it not a fact that the man was not where he should be for the purpose of mounting the street car, and is it not a further fact that the driver of any automobile had the right to expect a clear passage and no obstruction other than one with a light on it?

Mr. BOX. I think it is plain that the deceased was at the point where the street car was to be taken.

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman will permit, this report gives exactly the opposite; that he was on the opposite end of the street crossing from where the street car stopped.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. BEGG. As I read the report the gentleman was not in what we call the safety zone.

Mr. BOX. Well, he had passed beyond the crossing of the street, and gotten to a place where passengers usually took the car—went there for that specific purpose—and the obstacle appearing here in the street, entering or crossing Fourteenth Street, caused the driver in that street, who was driving the car that killed Higgins, without keeping a lookout, on a dark, cloudy morning to strike him. He did not know he had struck the man until he felt the jolt and dragged him 40 or 50 feet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I was trying to bring the matter to the attention of the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman from Texas, of course, makes a very appealing statement, but I feel that the amount is entirely out of proportion in view of these circumstances as to contributory negligence.

Mr. BOX. I am going to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] to discuss the matter with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think I ought to complete this statement. I am like the gentleman from Texas, and the appeal of the widow is as strong to me as to anyone. I had this bill marked after I had gone through the report, and I thought $1,000 sufficient under the belief that the death was one of indirect result of the accident and because of contributory negligence. The gentleman has so far worked upon my feelings that I would be willing to compromise the matter with the gentleman by putting it as high as $3,000, but that is the limit.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let me suggest two things. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] and myself were talking over the law. Of course in a Federal court upon General Crowther's report the widow of the deceased would be entitled to recover a proportionate amount.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; and the same committee, if the gentleman will pardon me, where there was no question of contributory negligence, where a man was killed immediately in line of duty, a younger man, a man about whose health there was no question, recommended $3,000, and in this case recommends—

Mr. DEMPSEY. Let us deal with the question we have here. I had a case of a man with the New York Central Railroad for the death of a coal driver who was killed by an automatic gate falling upon his head and crushing his skull. The New York Central Railroad, and it came into my mind since this matter was under discussion, paid the widow $6,000. Now, he only earned $12 a week, and the husband here earned $2,000 a year.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman from New York can not get me off in a discussion of some other case; just one at a time. My understanding of this is that a precedent of this kind would be far reaching in its effect.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I say to my friend that this is a case where this woman is in great need, because she frequently came into my office about the claim. Now, if the gentleman tells me he will object if there is not a reduction, I will be compelled to recede and accept the $3,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. I dislike to be in that position—

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am sorry the gentleman finds himself in that position. I had the view in my mind the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] has just presented, that the rule of apportionment applies in general terms in this country now, not only in the Federal courts but in the State courts, and $10,000 is the standard amount in death cases where they have no limitation at all, and here you have negligence upon both sides, according to your showing, and it seems to me it is fair to make the amount $3,000, assuming there may be contributory negligence.

Mr. CRAMTON. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Fannie M. Higgins the sum of $10,000 for damages suffered by reason of her husband, John H. Higgins, being struck and fatally injured by a Government automobile which was driven by a regularly enlisted soldier of the United States Army:

With committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000," and after the word "or," in line 6, insert the word "all." Page 1, line 10, after the word "Army," insert a colon and "Provided, That no part of the amount of any item appropriated in this bill in excess of 5 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered or advances made in connection with said claim; Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 5 per cent of the amount of any item appropriated in this bill on account of services rendered or advances made in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk first will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,000."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word regarding this amendment. I do not want to be understood as opposing the amendment. This Committee on Claims is as hard-boiled a committee as this House has seen. We have gone into the details of every claim that has been brought before us, and have tried to bring out some equitable and at the same time some scientific solution. In following out that plan of procedure we have in every instance called upon the Workmen's Compensation Board, maintained by the Government for the protection of workmen and for the purpose of seeing that justice is done to workmen employed by the Government, to tell us the amount in each case to which an injured civilian or a citizen would be entitled, provided that citizen were in the employ of the Government when injured.

Now, if an employee of the Government is killed through the fault of one of his fellow employees, or by carelessness has caused the injury or death of a fellow employee, the dependents of the injured or deceased would be given a certain specified amount by the United States Compensation Board. Now, we have taken the amount that the Federal Workmen's Compensation Board allows for the death of a workman. In some States it is $7,000, in other States it is $6,000; under the Federal Government it is $5,000. We have held to that sum as the basis of all our reports.

Now, if this House wants to establish something that is unscientific, if it wants to establish a price for the lifeblood of one of our citizens at $3,000, it will do so in this amendment. I am sorry for Mrs. Higgins and I am in sympathy with Judge Moore, but there is something more in this than Judge Moore or Mrs. Higgins or the $5,000. It is the establishment of the precedent of what you are going to pay for the life of a breadwinner.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I have been listening to this argument for some time. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] proposes to reduce this amount from $5,000 to $3,000. It is not the work of the committee; it is not the work of Congress. But it is one man, reducing this from $5,000 to $3,000. Now, the question of considering this bill and the question of fixing the amount are two different things. If this is a meritorious claim, if it is one for Congress to consider, it seems to me that it is not up to one man to exercise the power that he has here, of objecting to a bill, to club Congress into fixing that arbitrary amount that he would fix, in the face of what the committee recommends and what Congress itself does.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is well within his rights, as any other Member of this House is within his rights, in objecting to the consideration of any report which the committee may make. But what I want to impress upon Members of the House is this: You have a Committee on Claims. Have you any confidence in that committee? Have they shown you that they are worthy of confidence? You gentlemen do not see the hundreds of bills that are turned down, even when reports from the departments say they are at fault, but we find that they are not; we refuse to present the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I made an agreement with the gentleman in charge of this bill, and that agreement will be kept. No one proposed any objection while the agreement was being made. I am simply performing my duty, and that agreement will be kept, and unanimous consent is not necessary if you get a quorum here.

Mr. BOX. I will say to the gentleman that Judge Moore, who made the agreement, and the members of the committee on this side have stuck to the agreement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman, because I want to be understood by the House, that I stand by what I agreed to.

Mr. BOX. And the committee that conferred with Judge Moore understand the same thing.

Mr. CRAMTON. If we go back to this it, of course, comes up anew. We are proceeding under the regular rules. I withdraw the point of no quorum for the present, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to have the attention of the members of the committee. The Private Calendar, as everybody knows, is a little different from any other calendar. I appreciate the fact that you are not obligated to accept an amendment offered as this amendment was offered, but when any gentleman makes the flat statement that he will object unless the amount is cut down, unless somebody interposes an objection and the man who introduced the bill and fathers it says he will accept it, we are either morally bound to do that or we shall have to adjourn. And I will say that before I will consent to calling the roll I will make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I will first ask a division upon the pending question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were—yeas 45, yeas 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now upon the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I do not like any such proceeding as this, and I think I will make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I demanded that the vote be taken by the yeas and yeas, but the Chair did not put the question that way. I demand a division.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ABERNETHY) there were—yeas 57, yeas 3.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is another committee amendment.

Mr. BEGG. My amendment is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the next committee amendment, the word "all" in line 6.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the committee amendment commencing in line 10, the proviso.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to that proviso. On page 2, line 13, strike out the words "exceeding $1,000" and insert "less than $300 nor more than $2,000."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I will accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment, offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 2, line 13, strike out the words "exceeding $1,000" and insert in lieu thereof the words "less than $300 nor more than $2,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio what kind of fees they pay over in Ohio? Where a man gets $3,000, does he pay a fee of $2,000 to his attorney?

Mr. BEGG. I will just say to the gentleman from Texas—

Mr. BLANTON. That is going pretty steep.

Mr. BEGG (continuing). That there are instances in this city where attorneys have taken claims for individuals on a percentage basis as high as 25 and even 50 per cent.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Ohio does not want us to accept that kind of a proposition, does he?

Mr. BEGG. This amendment does not relate to fees, but is the fine in case an attorney violates the 5 per cent provision.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I see. I thought this related to the fee to be paid an attorney.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF DR. O. H. TITTMANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1917) for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. I object.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Will not the gentleman from Ohio reserve his objection, as I would like to make a statement concerning this bill.

Mr. BEGG. I will reserve it briefly so that we may go on, but I will say to the gentleman that I intend to object.

Mr. BLANTON. I also reserve the right to object.

Mr. BEGG. I will reserve my objection, if the gentleman from Missouri wants to make his statement.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I would like to make a statement. I introduced this bill about three years ago. Old man Tittmann went into the Government service and was in the service 47 years. He started at the bottom of the Geodetic Survey and built it. During the time of his service he did a great many notable things for the Government. One thing he did was to save this Government from losing millions of dollars when it was discovered that money was being stolen on imports and when there was great theft going on in Philadelphia. At that time he was selected as an expert on weights and measures, and he worked out a system by which the officials of the department saved this Government literally millions of dollars. When we had a dispute with Canada over the boundary line, they assigned old Doctor Tittmann to that boundary dispute, and officials of the department say nobody ever did better work for the Government than old man Tittmann, and he did settle the dispute between the two countries.

He went on for 47 years in the service of the Government, and in 1915 he was forced out by ill health. He is now in Pennsylvania with his wife, who has been with him all these years, on a 10-acre rented lot trying to make a living up there, while there are a great number of others who entered the service long after Tittmann entered it and have retired since that time and are getting $300 a month. If he could have stayed in the service five years longer, he would have gotten $300 a month as retirement pay. It looks like poor gratitude on the part of this Government, when a man has served the Government as long as Doctor Tittmann and yet when he comes down to this town he comes with his clothes threadbare, and the Government which he served so long has not enough gratitude to keep him out of the poorhouse.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman had a bill including all the employees who retired five years before the retirement act was passed, I probably would not object; but there are probably 1,000 others who are in that same situation.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. No; I do not agree with that at all.

Mr. BEGG. And if we pass this bill there will be 1,000 others in here making the same request, and unless there is a general provision to include them all, I shall object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Missouri sat here with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, Uncle Joe Cannon, who served in this House a longer period of time than Doctor Tittman served the Government. You are not proposing to pay Uncle Joe Cannon any pension for life.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. And Uncle Joe Cannon is not threatened with the poorhouse.

Mr. BLANTON. He might be.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. If he was, I would vote in favor of a pension for him; and if there is any other man who was in the Government service and who served the Government as long and as faithfully as this old man has done, I would vote for a pension for him.

Mr. BLANTON. Our regular Civil War pensions now aggregate nearly $300,000,000, and what is the gentleman going to do when we get to taking care of the soldiers of the late war as they come on, to say nothing of putting civilians on the pension roll who never served the Government in any war at all?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. We have got men walking the streets to-day on $100 a month.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EAST LAHAVE TRANSPORTATION CO. (LTD.), OWNER OF SCHOONER "CON REIN."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2498) for the relief of the East LaHave Transportation Co. (Ltd.), owner; A. Picard & Co., owner of cargo; and George H. Corkum, Leopold S. Conrad, Wilson Zinck, Freeman Beck, Sidney Knickle, and Norman E. LeGay, crew, of the schooner Con Rein, sunk by United States submarine K-4.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the East LaHave Transportation Co. (Ltd.), owner of the schooner Con Rein, of the port of LaHave, in the Province of Nova Scotia, Canada; that the claim of A. Picard & Co., the owner and consignee of the cargo aboard the said schooner, and the claims of the several members of the crew of said schooner, namely, George Corkum, Leopold S. Conrad, Wilson Zinck, Freeman Beck, Sidney Knickle, and Norman LeGay, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said schooner and the submarine K-4, owned by the Government of the United States and operated by the United States Navy, which occurred near Block Island, R. I., on August 20, 1921, may be sued for by the said claimants in the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, with jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter judgments or decrees for the amounts of such damages and costs, if any, as may be found against the United States in favor of the said claimants, or any of them, or against said claimants in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provision of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 3, strike out section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. FLAGG AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4012) to reimburse William H. Flagg and others for property destroyed by mail airplane No. 73, operated by the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, which I do not expect to do, I notice there is no provision in this bill, as in the former one, as to attorney's fees, and I should take it from the figures set out in the bill that there are no attorney's fees contemplated. Can the gentleman state as to that?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I could not. In the Sixty-seventh Congress Mr. Norton introduced the bill, and you will note the committee amendment which I proposed in the subcommittee. At that time Mr. Crosser represented these claimants. Mr. Crosser is in the House now, and he told me that, of course being in the House, he could not collect one cent in the way of fees.

Mr. CRAMTON. I hoped that statement would be made and I was sure that was the situation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; that is what he told me.

Mr. CRAMTON. And I withdraw any objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. May I make a statement? I want the Members of the House to know what the committee is trying to do, and the committee, unless it is brought to their attention that an attorney is trying to exact a large fee or unless we have our suspicion that an attorney is going to get a large fee out of these things, we do not feel it necessary to include that provision.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the committee, I think the opposite ought to be the case, and unless the committee is sure that there is no danger of an exorbitant attorney's fee they should put in the restriction and guard the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4012) to reimburse William H. Flagg and others for property destroyed by mail airplane No. 73, operated by the Post Office Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to William H. Flagg and E. B. Flagg, of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,038 for property losses sustained by them as a result of the destruction of their residence, furniture, and personal effects, caused by mail airplane No. 73, operated by the United States Post Office Department, striking the said Flaggs' residence, and thereby wrecking and burning the same.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Mary Torok and Elmer Torok, of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,175 for property losses sustained by them as a result of the destruction of their house, caused by mail airplane No. 72, operated by the United States Post Office Department, striking the said Mary and Elmer Torok's house and thereby wrecking and burning the same.

Sec. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Perry J. Lotz, of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,297 for property losses sustained by him as a result of the destruction of his furniture and personal effects, caused by mail airplane No. 73, operated by the United States Post Office Department, striking the said Lotz's residence and thereby wrecking and burning the same.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 7, page 1, strike out the figures "$6,038" and the words "for property losses" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500 in full settlement of all damages."

In line 2, page 2, strike out the period and substitute a colon and add the following: "Provided, That no insurance company shall be subrogated to the rights of the said William H. Flagg and E. B. Flagg."

In line 9, page 2, strike out the figures "$2,175" and the words "for property losses" and insert in lieu thereof "$460 in full settlement of all damages."

In line 14, page 2, strike out the period and substitute a colon and add the following: "Provided, That no insurance company shall be subrogated to the rights of the said Mary Torok and Elmer Torok."

Line 20, page 2, strike out the figures "$1,297" and the words "for property losses" and insert in lieu thereof "$432.24 in full settlement of all damages."

Page 3, line 1, strike out the period and substitute a colon and add the following: "Provided, That no insurance company shall be subrogated to the rights of the said Perry J. Lotz."

The committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

D. H. MACADAM.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1438) for the relief of D. H. MacAdam.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I want to ask whether the Postmaster General approved this bill in toto?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Postmaster General, in the letter the gentleman will see on the second page of the report, calls attention to the fact that Mr. Peterson, the assistant postmaster, had served two terms, and when Mr. MacAdam took the office his embezzlement had covered the term of his predecessor and of Mr. MacAdam. Mr. Peterson was arrested, and he was charged with embezzlement. He was punished. They proceeded to collect all they could. His embezzlement was $27,000, and it is now reduced to $5,514.39.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Postmaster General recommend that that amount be paid?

Mr. EDMONDS. I am sure that he did somewhere.

Mr. BLANTON. He has not done it in the two letters which I have read.

Mr. UNDERHILL. On page 3, the first paragraph of Mr. Bartlett's letter, the gentleman will find the following:

Under these circumstances, while the department has no doubt of the legal liability resting upon Mr. MacAdam, the facts are submitted for such action as the Congress may deem appropriate.

Then there are two other lines in the third paragraph—

In the present case, however, the department recognizes that there are some unusual conditions deserving of the consideration of Congress. During the time of Mr. Peterson's services as assistant postmaster the personnel of the office was made up largely of Chinese, Japanese, Hawaiians, and Portuguese, many of whom understood and spoke the English language to a very limited extent.

That made it possible for this Peterson to get away with this large sum of money, and he got away with it before Mr. MacAdam came to be postmaster; and after he became postmaster, after an inspection by two or three inspectors of the Post Office Department, the funds were found short.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] that if they will just get a report from the Department of Justice and find out just how many embezzlements are going on all of the time over the United States in post offices, it would surprise them. There is hardly a Federal court meets nowadays that does not have some of these cases on its docket, and we apparently have a system here, after the embezzlement takes place, of going through the Committee on Claims and reimbursing the losses that the Government has sustained.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, the postmaster is charged with this shortage. The assistant postmaster working under two different terms had been embezzling. The assistant postmaster was arrested and sent to jail. They collected everything they could. Is it fair that the present postmaster, who was an innocent victim, should have to pay the $5,514?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman were a cashier of a bank and had funds under his control, and his assistant was handling the funds, and the gentleman did not see that he handled them properly, he would be the man who would be held responsible.

Mr. EDMONDS. Very well; let that be so. Then in this case why should Mr. MacAdam be charged with this shortage because it was the postmaster before him that had charge of the matter? The United States sent their inspectors around. The inspectors passed on these amounts of the embezzlements and said that it was all right.

Mr. BLANTON. What has been done about collecting this money under the bond?

Mr. EDMONDS. Everything has been collected except $5,514. Originally the sum was $27,000.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to take some steps to require better bonds.

Mr. EDMONDS. Possibly that may be true; but these are the facts in this case, and I do not believe it is fair that the postmaster, who is an innocent victim, should be charged with the shortage of embezzlement made by another man under another term.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to D. H. MacAdam, of Honolulu, Hawaii, the sum of $8,749.39, being the extent of liability of D. H. MacAdam, as postmaster at Honolulu, Hawaii, to the Government of the United States, owing to the embezzlement of Federal funds by the assistant postmaster at Honolulu, Hawaii, prior to and during the term of office of D. H. MacAdam as postmaster at Honolulu, Hawaii.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$8,749.39" and insert the figures "$5,514.39."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HUBERT REYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5541) for the relief of Hubert Reynolds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. If I do, it will be to the tune of $69,300.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I hope the gentleman will remember that this bill was passed in the last Congress and to repass the bill at this time is a saving to the Government of the United States of $11,318.80. That is all this bill is. It is a law now. The Congress authorized the Postmaster General to settle with the bondsmen on account of the robbery at the Greeley post office for $69,300.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that I have made objection to this bill in three different sessions of Congress.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It is a law now.

Mr. EDMONDS. We passed it last year for $69,300.

Mr. BLANTON. Over my protest.

Mr. EDMONDS. But we have been able to collect part of the money and we are amending it to correct the account and reducing it to $57,983.20. It saves the Government $11,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. This bill is in a class by itself. It is the only one that saves the Government anything.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman is working in the interest of economy, he ought to be in favor of this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for the relief of Hubert Reynolds," approved September 21, 1922, be, and the same is hereby, amended by substituting $57,983.29 for the amount $69,300, in line 5, in order that the Postmaster General may be authorized to credit the former postmaster at Greeley, Colo., for the actual value of certain war savings stamps instead of their maturity value as provided by the act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BERNICE HUTCHESON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3143) for the relief of Bernice Hutcheson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to E. H. Hutcheson, guardian for Bernice Hutcheson, the sum of $2,318 for expenses incurred and permanent injury, the results of injuries sustained through being struck by a truck, the property of the War Department and driven recklessly by a soldier of the United States Army.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "E. H. Hutcheson, guardian for."

Page 1, line 6, insert after the figures "$2,318," "in full settlement of all damages against the Government."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, strike out the figures "$2,318" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,587.50."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield with much pleasure.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think it is fair to the House that let the bill go by under unanimous consent when any man here could have objected and stopped it because the committee had reported the bill—

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will make this statement, and if the gentleman thinks the amendment should not prevail I will withdraw it. I will leave it to the judgment of the Member.

Mr. BLANTON. I was willing to let the committee action go by and adopt it, but if I had known the gentleman was going to offer an amendment I would have objected.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am inclined to think the gentleman would not have objected if he had studied the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. How was it the gentleman did not get that amount in the committee?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Because I did not ask for it then.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this amendment provides for the payment of hospital expenses. When this accident occurred in December, 1918, and this young lady was run over by a Government automobile in the city of Augusta and had her leg broken, which resulted in an injury by which her left limb is some 2 inches shorter than her right, she was sent to the hospital, and that hospital bill amounted to $318. On the 27th day of December, 1918, she left the hospital but was compelled to return in about 15 days or two weeks and stayed in the hospital some two or three weeks longer, until her hospital bill amounted to $587.50. Now, I am asking to have this young lady compensated for the total amount of the hospital expenses. The committee was perfectly willing to compensate her in the total amount of $318, as I introduced the bill at that time, and when I reintroduced the bill at this session of Congress my secretary failed to include all the hospital expenses up to date, which amounted to $518, and that is the reason I offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEBANON NATIONAL BANK, LEBANON, TENN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3748) for the relief of Lebanon National Bank.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I object—

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will withhold the objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. With the gentleman's permission, I want to call attention to this fact: This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem certain coupons which were detached from Treasury certificates and United States bonds, I believe. They were lost out of a letter by inadvertence in the bank building. That fact is established by a number of affidavits of the bank officials that are on file before the Committee on Claims. This bill raises the question of whether Congress in any case will authorize the Treasury to redeem destroyed coupons which have been detached where the proof is absolutely clear and beyond controversy not only as to the fact of the destruction, but shows a complete detailed description of the bonds from which the coupons were detached.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit, I do not agree with the gentleman that this case will determine our policy. This case relates to coupons, and the Treasury Department says this about this case:

Moreover, the Treasury Department is opposed to any bill, such as H. R. 3748, providing for relief on account of the loss, theft, or destruction of coupons detached from bonds or notes.

And why should we overrule them unless we have a pretty good reason? Here is what they say, and it appeals to me as a good reason that we let it stand where they left it.

They say:

Moreover, the Treasury Department is opposed to any bill, such as H. R. 3748, providing for relief on account of the loss, theft, or destruction of coupons detached from bonds or notes. The chief reason for this is that there are several million pieces of coupon obligations of the United States outstanding, interest coupons from which are normally collected through the usual banking channels and come to the Treasury through the Federal reserve banks. The coupons are handled throughout the course of collection and payment without regard to their serial numbers, and manifestly any other course of procedure would be impossible in view of the vast number of pieces involved. The Treasury is quite unable as a practical matter to place stops against the payment of interest coupons which have been reported lost, stolen, or destroyed, and a bond of indemnity would, therefore, give little or no protection to the United States against the payment of coupons alleged to have been lost, stolen, or destroyed, which subsequently turn up and are presented for payment.

I do not need to read all the details. The department says that as to the coupons your provision for giving bonds would give us no protection, and there is no clear showing of their destruction. It is admitted they are lost.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. In that connection, if the gentleman will bear with me for a moment, we find that when the coupons come into the Treasury they are passed on by the Treasurer and checked up according to the serial number. In this case the bank gives a detailed description of the number and the date and every other particular about the coupons that were detached. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], I think, carefully examined the stack of affidavits by the bank officials, who identified the coupons and stated precisely how they were burned.

Mr. CRAMTON. There are a number of bills here as to bonds where the situation is different, and my point of view is different, and the department's point of view is different. We have a long calendar, and I could not, in view of that report and the logic behind it, let the bill go by.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Michigan will yield, I want to offer this suggestion: The coupon is the evidence of the debt. Where there is clear proof that the coupons were lost, where there is provision for the bonds, that is, for a bond to indemnify the Government, then the Government is protected. Now, the statement of the Treasury that they can not keep track of this flood of coupons coming in is not an accurate statement. I think that the Treasury itself will admit that it is reforming its methods along that line. It is incredible—it is almost unbelievable—that you can not organize the Bond and Redemption Division of the United States Treasury with as much efficiency as you can organize certain other business concerns that do have to be efficiently organized to protect themselves against things of that kind. Bonds are issued in series.

They are issued in number, and it would be the easiest thing under the sun to put in a system—and that system will be in operation inside of 12 months—whereby an efficient file clerk in the Treasury will be able to go as promptly to the canceled coupon or bond that is still on file as for the bank to go and in five minutes find a deposit slip or a group of deposit slips.

I happen to know of an instance that was brought to my attention recently, where they went back for years. So it is possible for the Government to put in an efficient filing system. If that be true, then ought we not to make a proper provision, because coupons are going to be lost and destroyed? Bonds also are going to be lost and destroyed. Of course we ought to be careful. But where there is a loss of that kind, and the claimant establishes that loss, and makes an indemnifying bond to the United States Government in double the amount, why is not that a safe precaution and a businesslike way of handling it?

Mr. BEGG. I will concede what the gentleman says as to the registered coupon bonds. Now, when you detach a coupon it has the same value as a $2 bill or a $5 bill in the way of exchange. That is, if you detached the coupon from a serial-number bond and started to the bank with it and lost it on the street and I found it, I can take it into my bank and cash it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is not a lawyer. There is a clear distinction between the transfer—

Mr. BEGG. I know there is a technical difference, but I am talking about the practical result.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman is not a lawyer, is he?

Mr. BEGG. No; I do not claim to be.

Mr. WINGO. I do not say that to the gentleman's discredit. But there is a clear distinction between a coupon of that kind and a $1 bill. That is the illustration that the gentleman gave.

Mr. BEGG. Now, supposing I take that coupon; I can get it cashed.

Mr. UNDERHILL. You have to make out a slip.

Mr. WINGO. You can sell a mule that is stolen.

Mr. BEGG. No; that is not the point. It is not stolen. The evidence in this case does not show whether they burned these coupons or lost them, or somebody stole them and sold them, and they can not find them.

Mr. WINGO. We have a right to rely on this committee to find the facts that demonstrate that somebody met with the loss.

Mr. EDMONDS. These papers were shown to have been put in an envelope and were inadvertently thrown into the waste basket and swept out. I believe that is the circumstance that was brought out in the evidence on this bill. The cashier of the bank stated that they were inadvertently lost out of a letter and were swept up with the sweepings and taken away.

Mr. WINGO. Where the loss is absolutely proven there certainly ought to be a safe, sound way by which that loss can be made good, especially if people are willing to indemnify the Government in double amount.

Mr. BEGG. I want to ask this question: Morally and legally, wherein is the Government obliged to redeem the coupon or the $5 bill that is burned?

Mr. WINGO. Because the bond on the coupon, whether registered or otherwise, is nothing but an evidence of debt. If the gentleman gives me a note and that note is burned, it does not cancel his moral or legal obligation. I can bring a suit and get a judgment in a court of law; and certainly there is no difference between the legal and moral obligation, because the debtor is obligated to pay.

Mr. CRAMTON. The report of the department makes it apparent that the department is not satisfied that the proof is clear and positive that the coupons were destroyed by fire, and hence their report that the department does not care to approve the bill, nor can it be stated that the department would interpose no objection to the passage of this bill or one substantially similar.

Mr. WINGO. Do they say they had the proof that was offered to this committee?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, the committee does not make a clear showing of proof.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think that a finding by the department as to the sufficiency of either the merit of the proposition or the establishment of a fact is binding on Congress?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it ought to be if it is within their province, unless we have facts before us which clearly demonstrate to the contrary, and that is not true here. Therefore I am obliged to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly, although it seems too bad to take up the time which other bills require.

Mr. BLANTON. I will not insist.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF EDWARD T. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5808) for the relief of Edward T. Williams.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Edward T. Williams, acting postmaster at Niagara Falls, N. Y., in the total sum of $87,932.77, due the United States on account of losses as the result of burglary on June 2, 1920, as follows: Postal funds, $4,306.27; postage stamps, $32,734.27; 8,044 war savings stamps at $4.17 each, $33,543.48; 20,225 thrift stamps at 25 cents each, $5,056.25; and internal revenue stamps, $12,292.50.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF WILLIAM R. BRADLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1316) for the relief of William R. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FULMER. I would like to state to my friend from Texas that this bill only proposes to allow the Internal Revenue Department to adjust the accounts of Mr. Bradley, who was acting internal-revenue collector in South Carolina in 1921, for one package of stamps lost during the time that he served and of no value, according to the statement of Mr. Mellon.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides that the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Edward T. Williams—

Mr. FULMER. I am sure the gentleman has the wrong bill.

Mr. BLANTON. What happened to this Williams bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That bill has been passed.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of William R. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina, with the sum of $100, this amount now being charged against him for the loss of one special stamp book of the value of $100.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that H. R. 3748, a bill for the relief of Lebanon National Bank, retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will retain its place on the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF CLEVELAND STATE BANK, CLEVELAND, MISS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 75) for the relief of the Cleveland State Bank, of Cleveland, Miss.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, unless I can get some information which will make me change my mind I will object.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides means for indemnifying the bank against the loss of a certificate of indebtedness. The Treasury Department admits that the certificate has never been presented for payment. In other words, it is still outstanding. The bill provides also for a proper bond to indemnify the Government against loss, and

I do not understand how any good reason could be interposed against allowing this special bill to be passed.

Mr. BEGG. The report shows that the department records do not show that certificate number so-and-so has been presented for redemption, consequently no interest thereon has been paid, and therefore it is thought that a bill for relief on account of the loss of this certificate should be passed. But that is not the point I am trying to find. The report says that the department has no evidence except certain papers on file and says these papers show that there are no claims that the certificate has been destroyed, but merely a claim that it has been lost. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma or the chairman of the committee or whoever has the information how long it has been since this claim was presented and the claim made that it was lost?

Mr. EDMONDS. The exact dates are not in the report, but these bonds matured November 7, 1918. The letter from the department states:

In view of the fact that a considerable time has elapsed since the maturity of the certificates and no claimant other than the Cleveland State Bank has appeared, the department will interpose no objection to the granting of the relief sought.

This is the usual form suggested by the Treasury Department, and we are protected by a bond for double the amount.

Mr. BEGG. Does the committee usually take up such claims for payment within three or four years?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, yes; we have done it in a shorter time than that, I think. Of course, we are protected by a bond for double the amount.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem United States Treasury certificate of indebtedness No. 22223, in the denomination of $1,000, payable to bearer, series IV-B, dated July 9, 1918, and maturing November 7, 1918, with interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum from July 9, 1918, to November 7, 1918, in favor of the Cleveland State Bank, Cleveland, Miss., or its assigns, without presentation of the said certificate, the certificate of indebtedness having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificate of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any interest which shall have been previously paid: And provided further, That the said Cleveland State Bank, Cleveland, Miss., shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the lost, stolen, or destroyed Treasury certificate of indebtedness, and the interest payable thereon, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificate of indebtedness herein described.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF THE OLD NATIONAL BANK OF MARTINSBURG, MARTINSBURG, W. VA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 214) for the relief of the Old National Bank of Martinsburg, Martinsburg, W. Va.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee or the gentleman responsible for it about the facts connected with this bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I trust the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. BEGG. I suspect the gentleman states the truth.

Mr. ALLEN. The report on this bill indicates very clearly that this bill ought to be passed.

Mr. BEGG. The report indicates that it is lost, strayed, or stolen.

Mr. ALLEN. The report also shows that the Treasury certificates were burned, and the evidence also shows that Secretary Mellon is perfectly willing that this bill should pass.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I did not read in this report any absolute evidence that these things were burned.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the gentleman did not read the report.

Mr. BEGG. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did read it. On the contrary, I want to ask the gentleman if these certificates were burned, why the ludicrous language which he has put in his bill when he says they are to be paid provided the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously paid. I want to ask the gentleman how could these certificates have been previously paid or presented for payment if he knows they were burned?

Mr. ALLEN. I did not draw the bill, I will give the gentleman to understand.

Mr. BEGG. Well, whoever drew the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. This is a Treasury Department bill.

Mr. BEGG. It does not make any difference to me who drew the bill; the gentleman says there is conclusive evidence in the report that they were burned. If they were, why this language?

Mr. ALLEN. There is an affidavit to that effect, and I say that if the gentleman has not seen it he has not read the report.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I might observe, in order to get down to the real evidence, the man who made the affidavit simply says that he took up the waste from the basket at the desk of the cashier and without making an examination of the contents thereof destroyed said contents by burning. That is a long way from saying these certificates were burned, but I think I ought to say that so far as I am concerned I make a distinction between this case and the coupon case. In the coupon case the department says that without an undue amount of red tape and expense and trouble they can not guard the interests of the Treasury even with an indemnity bond, but in this case they say that the indemnity bond will protect them if these certificates later show up, so I do not object personally, although I am bound to point out that there is a lot of question about their being burned.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield? Would the gentleman want to do business or put his bonds in a bank that is filling them in a wastebasket?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not know. That may be customary.

Mr. BEGG. I think I shall have to object.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BEGG. I will withhold it if the gentleman thinks he can convince me I am wrong.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The committee went into this matter very carefully through the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and he is quite ready to tell you fully about it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The evidence in this case showed that the bank official took out a bunch of these certificates and mailed some of them out to its correspondent and left the balance on the desk in the bank. Forgetting these bonds for some little time, the janitor came along and cleaned the desk and in cleaning the desk took the envelopes and papers and also these bonds. The evidence further showed that they made an effort, of course, to locate these bonds where they had been burned, but that was an impossibility, and no proof of that kind could be forthcoming. The evidence convinced the committee that these bonds had been destroyed. That being true and the bonds not having shown up at the Treasury Department, and a sufficient bond being filed to guarantee the Government against loss in the event they should hereafter show up, it occurred to the committee it would be proper to pass this bill.

Mr. BEGG. It was three years ago that this happened—in 1921?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 214) for the relief of The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, Martinsburg, W. Va.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America Nos. 4980, 4981, 4982, and 4983, each of the denomination of $500; 8175 and 8176, each of the denomination of $1,000, and all of the issue of United States Treasury coupon certificates of indebtedness, series TM 2-1921, dated July 15, 1920, and maturing March 15, 1921, with interest from July 15, 1920, to March 15, 1921, in favor of The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, of Martinsburg, W. Va., without presentation of the certificates, the said certificates of indebtedness having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any interest which shall have been previously paid: Provided further, That the said The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, of Martinsburg, W. Va., shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness of the United States of America, in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the said certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described which were lost, stolen, or destroyed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, and on page 2 strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and down to and including the word "destroyed," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "authorized and directed to redeem in favor of The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, Martinsburg, W. Va., United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 4980, 4981, 4982, and 4983, each in the denomination of $500, and Nos. 8175 and 8176, each in the denomination of $1,000, series TM 2-1921, dated July 15, 1920, and matured March 15, 1921, with interest from the date of issuance to the date of maturity at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum, without presentation of the said certificates of indebtedness, which have been lost, stolen, or destroyed:"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read another committee amendment, as follows:

In lines 22 and 23, page 2, strike out the words "of the United States of America" and insert "and the interest which had accrued when the principal became due and payable."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HENRY M'GUIRE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1306) for the relief of Henry McGuire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

A. W. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6557) to allow credit in the accounts of A. W. Smith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, in the settlement of the accounts of A. W. Smith, fiscal agent, Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, to allow credit in the sum of $111.75 now standing as a disallowance in said accounts on the books of the General Accounting Office, covering expenses incurred during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, in the erection of a building at the Bacon ranger station on the Klamath National Forest, Calif.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NELLIE ROCHE M'ANDREW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2574) granting a pension to Nellie Roche McAndrew.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL, GUNNISON, COLO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3104) granting 160 acres of land to the Colorado State Normal School, of Gunnison, Colo., for the use of their Rocky Mountain biological station.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. May I ask the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], if he has charge of the bill, why we should grant this particular normal school 160 acres of land and not make a similar grant to other normal schools?

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, the report in this case was prepared by my colleague from Montana [Mr. EVANS], who was not able to be here to-night. I recall the discussion before the Committee on the Public Lands, however. It seems that the Western State College of Colorado, situated near Gunnison, wishes to carry on some studies in biology.

Mr. BLANTON. Every college in the United States carries on research work in biology.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; if the gentleman will allow me to complete the statement, in order to carry on work of that kind they must be in control of an area of land which they can fence and have control of over a considerable period of years.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do they not buy it?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is a question, of course, presented by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and he said that there was no reason for buying. It is a piece of land that is not valuable for agriculture. Its location is such that its timber is not commercially valuable. This is the highest use to which it could be put. The bill contains every provision for reversion to the Government if the land is used for anything else.

Mr. BLANTON. I am 51 years of age, and I do not believe that I ever heard of any reversion back to the Government in any case yet.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, let me say that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is unable to be present to-night, and asked me to explain the situation if any question was raised about it. This is a piece of utterly worthless, rocky, mountain side, absolutely unsuited for cultivation. It would not make a home for anybody or anything else. They may graze a few goats on it or something of that kind. These people want to put a fence around it and study the biological condition there. It can do no harm. Why not let them have it inasmuch as this situation is peculiarly located where studies of that kind would apply to that entire rocky mountain region, not alone to this particular spot.

Mr. BLANTON. Why were not the mineral rights reserved to the Government in this bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. They are reserved. All mineral rights and all of these things are taken care of in the amendments which have been added to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the standard form of reservation?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; that is the standard form, but there is no known mineral there.

Mr. BLANTON. If we were to let this go by and two years from now a Teapot Dome lid was to come off, we would all be to blame, would we not?

Mr. HAYDEN. No. The mineral is reserved to the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the board of trustees of the Colorado State Normal School, Gunnison, Colo., subject to the provisions and reservations of section 24 of the Federal water power act, the following-described land, to wit, the south half of the southwest quarter of section 14 and the west half of the northwest quarter of section 23, all in township 51 north, range 1 east, New Mexico meridian, consisting of 160 acres, more or less, for use of the Rocky Mountain biological station of the said Colorado State Normal School.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "Colorado State Normal School" and insert "Western State College of Colorado."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "as," insert the words "and with a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands granted, together with the right of the United States, its grantees, or permittees, to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

Page 2, line 7, strike out "Colorado State Normal School" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "college: Provided, That the lands hereby granted shall be used by the State only for the purpose of a biological station, and if the said land or any part thereof shall be abandoned for such use for a period of two years, said land or such part shall revert to the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to declare such a forfeiture of the grant and to restore said premises to the public domain if at any time he shall determine that for a period of two years subsequent to the passage of this act the State has abandoned the land for the use of a biological station, and such order of the Secretary shall be final and conclusive, and thereupon and thereby said premises shall be restored to the public domain and freed from the operation of the grant aforesaid."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, is it too late for me to ask a question, to determine whether or not an amendment is needed, which I think everybody in the committee would agree to if it is needed? Is oil classed as a mineral?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is.

Mr. BEGG. Then why is coal named specifically?

Mr. HAYDEN. Because that is the form that has been used for a great many years.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting 100 acres of land to the Western State College of Colorado at Gunnison, Colo., for the use of the Rocky Mountain biological station of said college."

NEW JERSEY SHIPBUILDING & DREDGING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1572) for the relief of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., of Bayonne, N. J.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice that this bill provides for $152,278.28, of which $150,000 is for the boat itself, but on page 8 of the report, when we got past the fellows at the top who indorsed without knowing much about it and got down to the real finding of facts under No. 31, I find the following:

31. That Mr. Charles D. Pullen, vice president and treasurer of the New Jersey Shipbuilding & Dredging Co., stated that his company would make a claim against the United States Government in the sum of $100,000, being the value of drill boat No. 3, plus a further sum of $1,244.28 for each working day that elapses between the date of the sinking of drill boat No. 3 and the date upon which one of the company dredges is placed back on the work for the removal of blasted rock.

They were going to ask something farther for a loss by reason of lost time. That has been eliminated by the committee. Therefore it appears that the bill has $50,000 more than the owner originally thought that he would ask for.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I find in the report also where he carried $100,000 worth of insurance.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. If that is the case, it does not seem to me that we owe them very much.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman will find on page 3, at the bottom of the page, that two inspectors representing the engineer's office in New York constantly employed on the work fixed the value of the boat, one of them at $150,000 and the other at $250,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know. That is the trouble we have with that kind of inspectors going around.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Then you will find that this is not an ordinary scow type of boat, but that she was thoroughly equipped and fitted with machinery and tools, to the value of a considerable amount. I do not know just where to find that exact amount. The boat was entirely destroyed by this collision and disintegrated. These tools became scattered at the bottom of Hell Gate in New York and could not be recovered, and some allowance had to be made for that, but the committee did cut down from over $53,000 from the original bill of $205,928.28.

Mr. CRAMTON. As to that, Mr. Speaker, I am frank to admit there is good reason for this $150,000 if it can be produced, and I think maybe if the case goes over the committee can perhaps produce a good defense for their report. There is one other consideration I would like to call attention to with a view of having information upon it next time the bill comes up. Here is a case where the Government is going to suffer a loss of $100,000 or $200,000 because of the inefficiency and negligence in the handling of a boat by a naval officer, a lieutenant in the Navy. They had a board go into it, and the report does not indicate that the inefficient officer who occasioned this loss has been at all disciplined by the Navy. The Navy rushes in and takes complete responsibility of all the blame and renders the Treasury liable for this money. I would like to know if the Navy takes that position seriously enough so that they have disciplined their officer, and I hope when the bill comes up again we can have something tangible on that point.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will yield, the Committee on Claims could not very well go into this question or refer the bill to the Naval Committee, and I hardly think it would be right for the Member from Michigan to suggest that we keep this money from these people who are justly entitled to it because the Navy Department may or may not have punished one of its officers.

Mr. BEGG. Right there, what is the gentleman's answer to the fact in his own report he says they carried $100,000 insurance and when sunk the man said he only asked the Government $100,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Well—

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is true, but there is $53,000 of other expenses.

Mr. BEGG. Why did not they bring in a bill for $53,000?

Mr. BULWINKLE. That would make $153,000 and—

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts I think there is reason we should know as to the question as to the discipline of that naval officer. The Navy Department rushes in and takes the responsibility. Did they ever take the same view in dealing with their officer when they were dealing with placing the burden on the Treasury?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I am willing for the matter to go over and try to find out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. If I may yield, I believe this is the gentleman's bill?

Mr. FISH. I am interested in it and I am interested because this man has gone without his money for a number of years. This bill passed the Senate last year and came over here and was lost in the congestion of the last day of the session. Does the gentleman know how much it included when it passed the Senate and came over here? Was it not over $200,000? It was agreed on the part of the leaders of this House that it should go through, but the very last day's congestion lost it. The Speaker had agreed to recognize it for passage. These people have been going without $150,000 or $200,000 for a long time and—

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman from New York explain why it should cost $150,000 when the owner said he would only make a claim of $100,000?

Mr. FISH. It is all in black and white.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The additional claims would bring the matter up to a great deal more.

Mr. FISH. The bill was reduced from $200,000 to $150,000. I am perfectly willing for the gentleman to object, but we want a chance to go into the details.

Mr. CRAMTON. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

STANSFIELD A. AND ELIZABETH G. FULLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 914) granting six months' gratuity pay to Stansfield A. and Elizabeth G. Fuller.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90 to Stansfield A. Fuller and Elizabeth G. Fuller as compensation for the loss of their son, Stansfield A. Fuller, late of Troop M, Rhode Island National Guard Cavalry, who died at Fort Bliss, Tex., September 11, 1916, as a result of injuries received in line of duty.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

THOMPSON-VACHE BOAT CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2123) for the relief of the Thompson-Vache Boat Co., of Bonhomie Mill, Mo.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BEGG. Reserving the right to object, I have looked over this report very carefully and I find the report from the department to be unanimously against the Government's liability. Now, I will say to the gentleman sponsoring this bill I am perfectly willing to have it go through the Court of Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. That is where it ought to go; it ought to go to a tribunal for a trial on its merits.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, permit me to make a few remarks before the gentleman goes further. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that the report in this case does not present the evidence at all.

Mr. BEGG. That is not our fault.

Mr. LITTLE. I know that; it is my own, perhaps. I am supposed to make the report, but I never saw it. The Clerk prepared it, I understand, and he never reported to me and let me see it. While the department reported against it first, here are the circumstances, if the gentleman will yield to me a little time, and I will make it very clear. There is at Kansas City a snag boat called the Missouri, run by the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want it understood that I reserve the right to object.

Mr. LITTLE. The Government undertook to fix the course of the river there, and the stuff they collected was partially swept out. The snag boat went down and tried to pull the snags out. They pulled them down the stream until they had them under water, with the ends invisible sticking up, but under the water; so that the steamer had a nice chance to run into them. This Thompson-Bache Boat Co. had a nice little steamer called the Floyd, which they sold for $7,000. They ran into these snags, which wrecked their boat. They ask for the $7,000 that they would have gotten at Kansas City for the boat. The committee reported the bill last time, but it did not get on the calendar. The committee has reported it again.

The Government official, Captain Wilkes, reported against it. The snag-boat man, Captain Campbell, had a boatman named Fariss, and Fariss went to see Thompson, the man who owned the boat, and went back and told what Captain Thompson had said to him. He showed that he ran the boat with great care, and that nothing would have happened if the snags had not been under water. They deliberately lied about what was said by Thompson to Fariss, and Fariss to them. Upon that the Government held against Thompson. Then the evidence came before me on the subcommittee. I supposed it was in this report. I have not been able to find out why it does not appear. Captain Thompson says he told Fariss, who told Captain Campbell, the snag-boat man, the facts in the case, and Campbell lied about it.

I am not surprised that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] feels this way about it. I make this statement here because my name is appended to the report; it is nominally attached to this report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LITTLE. In a moment. I am apparently at fault here, and that is why I am taking some pains about it and making this statement. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Ellis, was on the committee last year, and he made a report. I find in the report this statement:

On the 28th of March, 1922, T. J. Fariss made the following affidavit, which is in evidence before the committee.

I will read it:

"I am mate on board the United States snag boat Missouri and have held the same office for the last seven seasons. During the month of April, 1920, I was sent by Captain Campbell, master of the Missouri, to interview Captain Thompson concerning the loss of the steamer Floyd. Captain Thompson stated that he was in the channel near the outside end of the high dike when the Floyd struck what he believed to be a submerged piling. I reported Captain Thompson's statements correctly to Captain Campbell, but he apparently misunderstood me, as I later saw his report to the district office in which he misquoted me by stating that Captain Thompson said he was running outside the tip of the low dike (more than 600 feet from the shore). I saw this report was in error, and so told Mr. Field, the clerk on the snag boat. I neither spoke of the mistake to Captain Campbell nor to anyone in the district office."

The fact is that Fariss told Captain Campbell that Thompson was running in the channel, and so stated to him; that Campbell turned right around and had Wilkes make a report that Thompson told Fariss Thompson was not in the channel. Captain Campbell's word, of course, is of no value whatever, and upon Campbell's report the whole War Department case on first report was based. Fariss told Campbell that Thompson was in the channel. Campbell reported that Thompson admitted being outside the channel. The whole War Department case is based upon the falsehood passed up to the War Department, and Fariss, in the evidence that comes from the War Department, clears the whole thing up.

The clerk, for some mysterious reason, left out this Fariss affidavit, which is the basis of the whole case. When the claim was presented before the committee, as Judge McREYNOLDS, of the committee, will tell you, attention was called particularly to this, and we saw the affidavit from Fariss. It is not here to-night. I think none of the papers are.

Now, this is a very clear case. The evidence is very clear. It all shows that there is no blame attaching to Captain Thompson at all. The evidence shows that. The department says that nobody claims that Captain Thompson was not competent. Nothing happened here except the deliberate, willful—vicious, almost—conduct on the part of the snag people in going to work in turning upstream under water the very things that killed the boat, and they have been lying about it, not misrepresenting it.

My name is at the head of this infernal thing, and I want to make it clear, and to that end you ought to give me a little leeway.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman going to object to it?

Mr. LITTLE. I call Judge McREYNOLDS's attention to the matter and ask him if I have stated the facts correctly.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I understand so, as I understood the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. I have in my hand the report by Congressman Ellis. He says that in 1922 Secretary Weeks wrote the committee and sent there the affidavit from Fariss, which the committee should read.

This—

He said—

of course disposed of the original objection, and Mr. Weeks presented it from some other angle. But for this false statement of what Thompson said, the original objection never would have been made. Whether people who made this report told an untruth purposely, or whether they were simply lacking in ordinary decent care to tell the truth, I do not know; but in either event their reports have no value, and therefore the Government really has nothing at all to go on.

Now, gentlemen, I think we have presented to you the essential facts in this case, and I hope that this situation will get the same equity here and the same consideration as it would have if the report really showed the evidence.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not certain whether I shall object to this or not. If I do, that will stop the debate. I want to state to the House that I hate to object to a bill with which the gentleman from Kansas is connected directly. The last bill that I objected to with which he was connected was the Sevier case.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the case I had referred to the gentleman from Texas as a committee of one.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman reported it, and I helped to kill it. The gentleman is acquainted with our colleague from New York, Mr. WAINWRIGHT, who formerly was Assistant Secretary of War. There happens to be in this report a statement officially made from our colleague, Mr. WAINWRIGHT, as Assistant Secretary of War. Here is what he says about the bill:

It is therefore believed that the claim of the Thompson-Bache Boat Co. is without merit, and that it should not receive a favorable report from the Committee on Claims.

That is signed by J. M. WAINWRIGHT, Assistant Secretary of War. What are we going to do with that?

Mr. LITTLE. That was the report that was made on the false testimony.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but it is from the Department of War.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, what of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say this, that if the gentleman will reintroduce this bill and ask permission to submit the claim to the court, I shall not object.

Mr. ROACH. I ask the gentleman from Texas to withhold his objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Texas to withhold his objection on this bill until I have made a statement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that it is nearly 11 o'clock, and there is no chance of changing the situation.

Mr. ROACH. I think the gentleman from Texas ought to withhold his objection in order to permit me to make a statement about a bill of which I am the author.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold my objection if the gentleman from Missouri can get other gentlemen to do the same.

Mr. ROACH. I have been decorous this evening, and it is always customary for gentlemen to withhold their objections in order to permit the author of a bill to make a statement in regard to it. If the gentleman from Texas does not want to do that, then he can object to it.

Mr. BLANTON. I have already withheld my objection.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one thing, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH] will pardon me one minute.

Mr. ROACH. I yield to the gentleman in order to make a statement.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I just want to refer the gentleman from Texas to the statement made by Mr. WAINWRIGHT, which was made on May 17, 1921. Now, there is a later statement in this record from Secretary of War Weeks in reference to this controversy, bearing out the statement which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] has made, namely, that Mr. WAINWRIGHT's statement was based on other and false testimony, and that is the reason Mr. WAINWRIGHT said that evidently there was no liability.

The proof in this case at present shows that the Government had undertaken to change the channel of this stream and put this piling in the stream; that the piling had broken loose, and the Government had gone there with a vessel and undertaken to drag the piling out of the stream.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman want to take up the time until 11 o'clock, when other bills are waiting? If he does, it is all right with me.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I have taken about two or three minutes, and I judge the gentleman from Michigan, who is not a member of the Committee on Claims, has taken at least three-quarters of an hour this evening.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no interest in the bills to follow.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am on this subcommittee and I helped to pass on this testimony. I think this is a just claim. This boat was shown to be worth twice the amount; it was going up the Missouri River with an experienced man in charge; these piles were left in the center of the river, and it was on account of the Government having tried to pull them out of the river that this accident occurred and caused the destruction of this vessel. Therefore it has looked to me as though you should not force these people to go into court and undertake to recover there. I will not take any more of your time.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, is it in order for me to make a parliamentary inquiry at this time with the gentleman from Missouri on the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri has the floor, and if he yields the gentleman may make his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief statement in regard to this matter, if I may be permitted to do so. In response to what the gentleman from Texas said just a moment ago, it appears in the report—if the gentleman from Texas will give me his attention—

Mr. BLANTON. I am listening.

Mr. ROACH. In the report made by the Secretary of War the statement is found that they have no objection to conferring jurisdiction upon a court to determine this case and the merits of this claim. The point I wish to make to the gentleman from Texas is this: That a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims held hearings upon this measure and went thoroughly into the facts; likewise the Committee on Claims, a responsible committee of this House, heard the testimony which a court would have to hear, and after hearing that testimony reached the inevitable conclusion that this was a just and meritorious claim.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROACH. In just a moment and I will. There are precedents in this House where responsible committees, having inquired into the facts and merits of a claim, as in this case, have allowed the claim and paid the bill in Congress rather than to put the claimants to the delay and the expense incident and necessary to carrying the case into court.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. ROACH. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman can get our colleagues, Judge Box and Major BULWINKLE, who are on this committee, to make a speech for this bill, I will withdraw my objection; but I do not believe the gentleman can do it.

Mr. ROACH. I am quite sure that if the gentlemen referred to had had all the facts before them that the subcommittee which reported this claim had before it and heard all of the testimony they would get up on the floor of this House and make a speech in favor of this claim.

I have not a particle of personal interest in the claim except to see equity and justice done to honest citizens of this country, and I make this statement for the reason that these two men had their earthly possessions invested in this boat and it was sunk as the result of gross negligence and carelessness of Government employees in attempting to pull piling out of the main channel of the river, and that such employees did it in such a careless manner as to make a veritable death trap for boats that had a right to travel in that channel.

Now, with these unquestioned facts before the subcommittees and with these unquestioned facts before the main committee, they have recommended payment in this case. Now, why in the name of high heaven does the gentleman want to subject honest citizens, who have their all invested in a boat that is sunk through the carelessness of Government employees, to be put to the expense of employing counsel, summoning witnesses, and going into court when a committee of this House has passed upon the bill.

I hope the gentlemen, who have objections in mind, will not make any objection to so meritorious and just a claim as this one?

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ROACH. I will gladly yield and answer any question the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. BEGG. There are only two questions I want to ask and I can ask both of them in one. In the first place, everybody knows, and no one knows it better than the gentleman speaking, and I am referring to the gentleman from Missouri, that the channel in the river shifts from time to time. The evidence states that this particular captain had not piloted a boat on this river for over two years.

Mr. ROACH. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. BEGG. The report says two years. I do not know whether it was one year or six months; all I know is what the report says. The report also says that the pilot, who had been a skilled pilot, made no effort by going to the navigation office to ascertain any shifts in the channel, and that a Government boat, the Missouri, a larger boat, did navigate the channel unmolested and unharmed.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman now let me answer the questions? His first question goes to the experience of the pilot who was in charge of this boat. Let me state for the information of the House that the clear, convincing, unquestioned testimony—and the record is replete with it—is that this was one of the most experienced pilots who ever operated a boat upon the Missouri River; that he had acted in the capacity of a pilot and had had a pilot's license from the Government for a period of 20 years or more. Now, a member of this firm had died, which made it necessary to sell this boat, and they had contracted the boat for sale at Kansas City, to be delivered. Not willing to risk his own judgment upon the currents at that season of the year, this experienced pilot, with over 20 years of experience, called to his aid and assistance another experienced pilot. They were proceeding cautiously, as the evidence showed, up the Missouri River to deliver this boat when they struck this submerged piling that had been pulled right down in the middle of the channel by the Government agents and was lying there concealed beneath the water and the boat sunk.

So much for the experience of the pilot. Now, as to the responsibility of the pilot for not making inquiry at the Kansas City office, the evidence shows that the Kansas City office did not know a thing about what their agents had so criminally and negligently done there in the stream with reference to leaving this submerged piling, and they did not know about it until it had been proven in this case that they were criminally negligent. So if they had made inquiry at the Kansas City office they would not have got any information because the Kansas City office did not know anything about it.

Furthermore, we have the testimony of experienced river pilots upon the Missouri River in this record that shows that it is not the custom, that it is not the practice, and that it is not required that pilots shall make inquiry at the district engineer office with reference to the condition of the stream. I believe that fully answers both inquiries that the gentleman has made.

Mr. BEGG. I do not believe it does, for this reason: Navigation had not opened. This was in March and navigation had not yet opened, and there had been only one boat, the Missouri, to make the trip and, as I understood it, that was a Government boat. Now, would not just common, ordinary precaution urge a man not having navigated the river for two years to have gone to the navigation office to find out something.

Mr. ROACH. Let me ask the gentleman this question in answering his: It was the plain duty, admitted by all, of the Government agents who left this piling in that dangerous condition to put a buoy on it or a marker to indicate that they had left a dangerous condition in that channel. Are you now going to say that these men had to inquire of the men who made this dangerous condition as to whether they had left it there or not, or otherwise they can claim the benefit of their own negligent act? That is exactly what you would require them to do if you required them to inquire at the Kansas City office for information which they did not have.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ROACH. I will gladly yield.

Mr. BEGG. I would not be absolutely positive about the accuracy of this, but I think the statement is in the report that even if a buoy had been put at this place, the ice would have washed it away.

Mr. ROACH. That is true.

Mr. BEGG. Because of the season of the year, and there was no way to physically mark this or for them to learn about it except to go to the district office and get the information.

Mr. ROACH. It is true that the Government office at Kansas City undertakes to justify itself in not placing a buoy or a marker there to indicate the danger by stating that at that season of the year the river was liable to have ice in it, which would have swept such a buoy away; and, as a matter of fact, within two or three days after this accident the river did have ice in it which would evidently have swept the buoy away, but to meet that sort of an unfair contention on the part of the Government—and I want the gentleman from Ohio to listen to this—the river pilots on the Missouri River testify that if there had been a buoy placed there, and if it had only remained one day, the notice would have gone up and down the river that a buoy had been placed there and accidents would have been avoided. I hope the gentleman will not make an objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the clerk of the committee, I would like to state that the papers in this report were taken by myself and ordered printed out of the data furnished us to prove the case. I have published pretty nearly all of the papers that I had. I did not know of the affidavit the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] speaks of, and the Clerk knew nothing of it. I had no evidence of it in my docket. If it had been there it would have gotten into the report. Another thing I would like to say is this: I think the evidence clearly shows that there was a lot of piling driven down the river. It was not exposed at high water, and the steamer hit it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Has a bill any priority by reason of the fact that a similar Senate bill in identical language is on the Speaker's desk, and could it be called up out of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

GREENPORT BASIN & CONSTRUCTION CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3348) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a certain claim as the result of damage sustained to the marine railway of the Greenport Basin & Construction Co.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $559.98 to the Greenport Basin & Construction Co., of Greenport, N. Y., as compensation for damage to their marine railway caused by the United States Coast Guard cutter Pequot.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. TYDINGS, for to-day, on account of important business, at the request of Mr. HILL of Maryland.

Mr. BLACK of Texas, for to-day, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 22, 1924.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, the heavens declare Thy glory and the firmament sheweth Thy handiwork. We bless Thee this morning that Thou art ours, related to us in such a blessed way through Thy Son. We would recognize our obligations to serve Thee acceptably. In all the varied duties which come to our hands we beseech of Thee to help us, so that to the country as well as to Thyself, our God, we may render acceptable service. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1924.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr., a Senator from the State of New York, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. WADSWORTH thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

THE JOURNAL.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

GRAVES OF SOLDIER DEAD ABROAD.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move a reconsideration of the vote by which House bill 7449, the first deficiency appropriation bill, was passed, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the motion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Frazier	Ladd	Sheppard
Ball	George	Lodge	Shields
Bayard	Gerry	McKellar	Shipstead
Borah	Glass	McKinley	Simmons
Brandegee	Gooding	McLennan	Smith
Breussard	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Bursum	Harrell	Mayfield	Stanfield
Cameron	Harris	Neely	Stephens
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Swanson
Canaway	Heflin	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	Howell	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Johnson, Minn.	Owen	Warren
Hedge	Jones, N. Mex.	Ralston	Watson
Ellis	Kendrick	Ransdell	Weller
Ernst	Keyes	Reed, Pa.	Willis
Fletcher	King	Robinson

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHBURST], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained in a committee meeting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, my purpose in moving a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate passed the first deficiency appropriation bill yesterday is to enable me to present an amendment for the insertion of a limitation on the expenditure of an item which is found on page 49 of the bill, appropriating $548,550 for headstones to be placed in American cemeteries in Europe. The amendment was suggested to the Committee on Appropriations and I understood that it was acceptable to that committee, but it seems there was a misunderstanding and that they expected me to offer the proviso on the floor of the Senate, which I was unable to do as I was necessarily absent yesterday. My purpose in asking for reconsideration now is simply to offer an amendment to that one item, and I understand there is no objection to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator have read the amendment he proposes in advance of action on the motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to submit.

The READING CLERK. On page 49, line 21, after the word "expended" and before the period, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That none of the money so appropriated shall be expended except for headstones or markers to be placed upon the graves in American military cemeteries overseas, which shall be of the same general form and design and having the same general effect as the existing wooden markers.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In explanation of the proposed amendment I will say that the Quartermaster General plans to remove all of the white crosses now marking the graves of American soldiers abroad. The American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Battle Monument Commission, the Gold Star Mothers, the association of fathers of men who died overseas, General Pershing himself, everybody that I know of, except the Quartermaster General, want to have the crosses retained. They can be retained in durable, permanent form, either of bronze, painted white, of the same dimensions of the present crosses, or in some other permanent material, at a much lower expense than would be entailed in putting in the little cubes of marble which the Quartermaster General has in mind. We can do it more cheaply and we can do it to the satisfaction of the relatives and comrades of the men who are buried there.

There are about 30,300 graves there, and I believe the plan which we propose of perpetuating the crosses which have been immortalized in the poetry of the war will cost the United States in the end less than the inappropriate little marble headstones proposed by the Quartermaster General.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Referring to the proposed limitation which the Senator contemplates, are all the American dead now gathered in those American cemeteries or are there some yet buried in the French cemeteries?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. All the American soldier dead in Europe have been concentrated in eight main cemeteries. The only exception to that statement is that a very few bodies have been retained at points of disaster, like the point in northern Scotland where the men who were drowned on the Tuscania were buried when the bodies came ashore. They are buried in well-kept little cemeteries devoted only to American dead.

Mr. CARAWAY. Under the limitation proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, no part of this appropriation could be expended to pay for markers on the graves of those buried in Scotland?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I think so, because those are American dead.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know, but the amendment would seem to recite that the dead must be buried in an American cemetery.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will excuse me, I desire to say merely a few words as to the business aspect of the pending proposition. The proposal is largely of a sentimental nature. The matter was brought before our committee and favorably considered by, if not all, quite a proportion of the committee. It seemed, however, to trench a little upon the rule, and it was agreed that it should be offered on the floor as a unanimous-consent matter rather than to include it in the bill. The understanding of the chairman of the committee and of the clerk of the committee was that the Senator from Pennsylvania would offer the amendment from the floor or would ask some other Senator in his place to do so. The Senator, however, very naturally—and perhaps it may have been my fault—left with the idea that the amendment would be offered by the chairman of the committee. Hence I made no objection to the recall of the bill. Unusual as it may be, still it is within the rule to call the bill back.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, let me see if I understand the proposal. A difference exists between the Quartermaster General and other military authorities as to the material to be used and the character or design of the markers which are to be erected. All authorities except the Quartermaster General desire that the form of a cross shall be used, and also that material other than marble shall be used. The Quartermaster General wishes to use a marker similar to that which is placed at the graves of Union soldiers, which consists of a small marble slab.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; he desires that substantially the same character of markers shall be used as is placed at the graves of Union soldiers.

Mr. ROBINSON. The object of the amendment is to prevent the design of the Quartermaster General prevailing and to give effect to the decision of the other authorities whom the Senator from Pennsylvania named in his opening statement?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Arkansas states the matter very well.

Mr. ROBINSON. The limitation in the amendment is to the graves in military cemeteries overseas, I understand?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President. Therefore I ask, in accordance with the suggestion of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] that the words "the American military" be stricken from the amendment now on the table, so that it will read:

Provided, That none of the money so appropriated shall be expended except for headstones or markers to be placed upon the graves in cemeteries overseas, which shall be of the same general form and design and having the same general effect as the existing wooden markers.

That will take care of the very few bodies that are buried in spots like the cemetery in northern Scotland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the reconsideration of the votes by which the bill was read the third time and passed? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered. The bill is in the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution of the Women's Delphian Club of Riverton, Wyo., favoring the passage of the so-called Johnson immigration bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from The Bon Co., of Cheyenne, Wyo., praying for the passage of the so-called Capper truth-in-fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS presented a resolution adopted by the Civitan Club of Atlanta, Ga., favoring the establishment by the Federal Government of sanitariums for the treatment of drug addicts, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Coldwater, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Johnson immigration bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented telegrams and a paper in the nature of petitions, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of St. John, Neosho Falls, and Ransom, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of legislation more stringently restricting immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the Ohio State Industrial Traffic League, at Columbus, Ohio, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 2327, to amend section 4 of the Interstate commerce act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the board of education, Fulton County public schools, of Wauseon, Ohio, protesting against the passage of legislation creating a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the United States, praying an amendment to the Constitution granting equal rights to women, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution of Wyandotte Post, No. 83, the American Legion, of Kansas City, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation granting adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Shawnee County, Kans., praying that the quota allowed in pending immigration legislation be based on the census of 1890 rather than the census of 1910, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

OPERATION OF VETERANS' BUREAU IN ARIZONA.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I present a letter from Governor Hunt, of Arizona, with reference to the compensation of hospitalized veterans, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATEHOUSE,
Phoenix, Ariz., March 14, 1924.

Hon. RALPH CAMERON,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On February 19 I addressed a letter to the members of the Arizona delegation in Congress, calling attention to the objection on the part of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War in Arizona to section 10 of the recommendations of the senatorial committee with reference to the compensation of hospitalized veterans.

I have just been informed by Mr. J. A. Billingsley, vice commander of the State Department of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, of Arizona, that immediately following the publication of my communication Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager of the Veterans' Bureau, District No. 12, overnight issued an order that any disabled veteran in District No. 12 receiving vocational training and receiving any wage, commission, or bonus from the employer under whom he was learning a trade or profession would have the amount received from his employer deducted from his Government check each month.

I am further advised that this is the only district in which such an order has been made.

I call this to your attention in order that you may inquire why this discrimination should be made against the veterans of this district. This matter does not concern the veterans of Arizona alone, in fact only to a limited extent, because there are very few in this State affected. It concerns the veterans who are being hospitalized in Arizona from every State in the Union, men who have been sent here because of the climatic conditions and the fact that they are suffering from diseases which this climate will benefit.

I do not know whether the fact that I had the temerity to address the Arizona delegation in Congress on behalf of the disabled veterans is responsible for this order, but the fact remains that it has been put into effect. I would appreciate it, and I know the disabled veterans of District No. 12 will appreciate it, if you will call this outrageous discrimination to the attention of the American people.

A little sidelight upon the manner in which the Veterans' Bureau in Arizona is being treated in the way of funds: I am advised that there are 3,000 disabled veterans in this State, and the subdistrict office is allowed only 20 cents per day for telegrams to be sent on behalf of disabled veterans.

Respectfully yours,

GEO. W. P. HUNT, Governor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) authorizing the President to extend an invitation for the holding of the Third World's Poultry Congress in the United States in 1927, and to extend invitations to foreign governments to participate in this congress, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 297) thereon.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 1762) providing for the acquirement by the United States of privately owned lands within Taos County, N. Mex., known as the Santa Barbara grant, by exchanging therefor timber, or lands and timber, within the exterior boundaries of any national forest situated within the State of New Mexico, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 298) thereon.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. RANDELL. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2656) granting the consent of Congress to the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La., and I submit a report (No. 296) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of New Orleans, a municipal corporation existing under the laws of the State of Louisiana, its successors and assigns, through its public belt railroad commission, as authorized by the constitution of the State of Louisiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, near and above the said city, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GOODING:

A bill (S. 2902) authorizing the acquiring of Indian lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, in Idaho, for reservoir purposes in connection with the Minidoka irrigation project; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2903) to permit loans under the Federal farm loan act on 60 per cent of the value of permanent, insured improvements; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. McKINLEY:

A bill (S. 2904) to declare a certain portion of the Kankakee River nonnavigable waters; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 2905) to amend section 25 (a) of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2906) for the relief of Robert K. Christenberry; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2907) for the relief of the heirs of Robert E. L. Rogers; and

A bill (S. 2908) for the relief of the Crystal Steam Laundry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2909) for the relief of Peter Shell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 2910) to pension blind or partially blind children of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIS:

A bill (S. 2911) granting an increase of pension to Mary V. Jones (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKINLEY:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 104) requesting the President to invite the Interparliamentary Union to meet in Washington City in 1925 and authorizing an appropriation to defray the expenses of the meeting; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REDUCTION OF TAXES.

Mr. HARRISON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6715, the revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

H. R. 5808. An act for the relief of Edward T. Williams; to the Committee on Claims.

CONDUCT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a morning newspaper carrying in its headlines the information that United States marines have landed in Honduras. From time to time we get information from the newspapers as to various happenings in countries in Central America in which the armed forces of the United States seem to be involved.

Up to this time I have had no further source of information than the newspapers. Sometimes I wonder if we are not developing another Balkan problem down in Central America. I sometimes wonder—I am forced to wonder—what is the foreign policy of the Government of the United States. I do not question the motives of the President and the Secretary of State, but sometimes I can not do otherwise than be compelled to question their viewpoint.

Some days ago I submitted a resolution, to which I expect to call the attention of the Senate next week or in the near future, asking the Secretary of State to inform the Senate to what extent the American Government sanctioned the loan that was made last week to the Government of France by the Morgan syndicate of American bankers. That information we also received from the newspapers. When I addressed the Senate on that subject I called attention to the fact that the newspapers said the sum of the loan amounted to $50,000,000.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator opened his remarks by referring to the landing of American marines in Honduras for the announced purpose, according to newspaper dispatches from that country, of protecting American lives and American interests in the capital of Honduras. While it has no particular connection with the case, it happens that the minister to Honduras is a citizen of the State of New Jersey, and I read with a great deal of personal satisfaction and gratification in the reports from the State Department that the American minister, Franklin E. Morales, was highly commended for his activity and foresight in the handling of the situation. It appears that he had constructed, as I recall the press dispatch, a wireless apparatus over the legation, with which he was able to communicate with an American man of war. The capital of Honduras, as the Senator undoubtedly knows, is in the interior, some hundred miles away from the coast, but, through the medium of that wireless apparatus, he was able to secure the presence of a hundred-odd marines for the protection of American property and American interests. Does the Senator intend by the statement in his opening remarks to criticize the action of the American representative in taking that summary action, or what is the nature of his comment, so far as it refers to Honduras?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, allow me to say to the Senator that my remarks were not directed in criticism; I was merely calling the attention of the Senate to various incidents that are happening which involve the armed forces of the United States, and, so far as I am concerned, very little information is furnished as to the reason for these happenings. The only information we have we derive through the newspapers. In my opinion, this condition was of sufficient importance to be called to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Simply on the question of general practice, it is the undoubted right of the Executive to send forces, either of the Navy or of the Army, for the protection of American lives and property, and for that purpose alone, in foreign countries. It has been done over and over and over again; constantly. It is a recognized power of the Executive. Very prompt action may be required, and it would be utterly impossible for Congress to do anything. The danger would be over; the Americans would be killed and their property would be destroyed if the Commander in Chief did not have that authority to order troops or ships to any point where he was satisfied that American lives and property were in danger. It is a very common thing; there are scores of such incidents in our history.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, as the Senator from Massachusetts states, it is one of the duties of the Chief Executive to protect American lives and American property under such circumstances and conditions as seem to be indicated in the press dispatches, but the policy which has obtained for the last 10 or 15 years with reference to Central America has gone much further than merely protecting the lives and property of Americans. Just what this particular instance means I do not know; I am not informed as to that; but I do know, with reference to Nicaragua and Haiti and Santo Domingo that we proceeded much further than was necessary to protect American lives and American property. The fact is that we are establishing over the Central American countries the dominancy of the United States Government. The question whether it is a wise policy or not would justify considerable consideration and much discussion, in my judgment, before we should conclude ourselves upon it.

Our action in Nicaragua resulted in practically destroying the sovereignty of Nicaragua. We established our marines in the capital of Nicaragua some 10 or 11 years ago. They have been kept there, as I am informed, ever since. We practically named as the President of the country a clerk of a Pittsburgh corporation, and have kept him there. I say "ever since"—I would not be certain as to the immediate present, but we kept him there for a number of years. Admiral Long, who went there for the purpose of investigating the situation, said, in his report—which can be had by anyone who desires to investigate the matter—that the President of Nicaragua was being maintained against the desires of 80 per cent of the people of Nicaragua. Any time that the marines had left the capital at Managua, the President, whom we had practically installed, would have had to depart. While we were there we concluded a treaty with Nicaragua, a treaty with a government which we had set up, with a President that we were maintaining, which was, in effect, making a treaty with ourselves. That goes much further than merely protecting the lives of individuals and the property of individuals in any particular instance, and I think it is a matter of serious import.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator must have noticed, of course, that I confined my statement to general principles, as I said.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. I do not mean to say that there have not been cases where they have begun on that principle and have pushed it much further. I think those are comparatively rare, however. Nicaragua is a very gross instance.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator from Massachusetts said. Will he kindly repeat it?

Mr. LODGE. I said that the Senator from Idaho noticed, of course, when I made that brief explanation to the Senator from Minnesota, that I was speaking only of the general principle, and not of specific instances. The instance of Nicaragua, of which he has just been speaking, undoubtedly began with the action under the general principle of sending the forces of the United States to protect American lives and American property. It was extended in a very extraordinary way. It has gone on, I think, for more than 10 years. It dates very far back. Zelaya is the man who was driven out and another man was put in, and undoubtedly was sustained by the presence of American marines. I think we had 100 at Managua, and they were sufficient to control the situation.

That is going further than protecting American lives and property, of course; but I think those cases are exceptional and rare, and while I do not know the details of the Honduras case, the general policy always has been and always must be that the Executive, the Commander in Chief, should have the power to protect American lives and property.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Of course.

Mr. LODGE. I will take a striking case, and that is the Boxer rebellion.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will say to the Senator that I did not mean to question the desirability or the right of the executive or any other branch of the Government to protect the rights and lives of American citizens. There have been instances, however, that seemed to me to go a great deal further than that; and having no particular information on the Honduras situation, I simply called it to the attention of the Senate with the possibility in view that some information would be brought out here so that we may know whether this is simply a bona fide action for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens or whether it is a military penetration into a friendly foreign country.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may say just a brief word, I have had some personal interest in this matter, mainly because of the fact that a man I had recommended for the office of American minister had received the appointment; and for that reason, seeing the reports in the newspapers of the insurrection in Honduras, I naturally followed it with some interest and made some inquiries. The result of those inquiries, while not made in the form of a request for official information but just for my personal satisfaction, was in effect—and I think the newspapers have printed most of the same information—that there was a revolution in Honduras, which is still under way, with, in this case, three opposing armies, three men each attempting to become President of the Republic. The American legation in the capital of Honduras was made to a great extent, as I presume is usually the case, the refuge for Americans and other foreigners whose lives, according to the information I received, were in danger because of indiscriminate shooting throughout the streets of the capital. As I stated before, the American minister was able, through his wireless device, to communicate with the authorities and secure the necessary permission, I presume, so that the marines were landed for the sole purpose of protecting American lives and American property and those who had asked the American minister for such protection.

I personally know none of the details beyond that; but having read in one of the New York papers only yesterday, or perhaps the day before, that the American minister was highly complimented for his ingenuity and his promptness in handling this situation, which arose through the presence of drunken, riotous soldiers on the streets of Tegucigalpa, and that his promptness had met the approval of the American Government, I felt very much pleased with it so far as it has gone. If it goes beyond that, as in the case of Nicaragua, that is quite another matter; but certainly with a revolution going on, with three opposing armies entering the city, and with the looting and drunkenness that was reported by the press dispatches, it seems to me the American minister took the action that a representative of the American Government should take; and if that information is correct, I am quite sure that every Member of the Senate will approve of the action he took.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I say just one word more? Then I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The proposition of protecting American lives and American property as a principle is correct; but it covers a multitude of sins, as we have found during the last 10 or 15 years in Central America. There is a book just out, written by a Frenchman, which makes some startling revelations as to what we mean when we say we protect American lives and American property in Mexico and Central America. If the author gives the facts correctly—and I rather think he does, because he goes into details, and states facts and figures and dates and individuals—the fight in Mexico for the last 10 or 12 years has been a fight between individuals, oil interests, organizing revolutions and supplying the means by which these insurrections should be carried on. The English interests, represented by Cowdray, and the Standard Oil Co. have actually organized and carried on revolutions there, and finally we get interested under the theory of protecting American lives and American property. As a matter of fact, we are protecting or opposing a revolution which has been initiated, financed, and carried on by people who of course are Americans, but who are down in a friendly country actually violating the laws of the country.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. HARRELD. Did not the investigation before the Public Lands Committee show that Mr. Doheny had personally contributed over $5,000,000 to one of those insurrections?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think something of that kind was brought out; but it seems that Doheny was following a long-established custom. He was not initiating any new policy.

Mr. HARRELD. I want to call attention to the fact that in August, 1922, I made a speech on the floor of the Senate in which I charged that the Doheny interests, the Royal Dutch Shell interests, and the Standard Oil interests controlled 90 per cent of the production in Mexico, and the facts I stated at that time have never been disputed; and they were furnishing money for these very things at that time.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator was very likely correct in the percentage of control which he stated they had; and the revolution which is now on in Mexico is in all probability the same kind of revolution that we have been dealing with for the last 10 or 12 years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I said at the beginning that I do not question the integrity or the motives of those who conduct our foreign affairs, but I said that I might be forced to question their point of view. It is a question of how far the Government of the United States, backed by its resources, shall go in becoming involved in quarrels and financial deals which are promoted by private individuals under the often-reiterated slogan that the American flag must follow the American dollar. For that reason I called the attention of the Senate last week to the loan made by Morgan & Co. to the Government of France. The day after I addressed the Senate the newspapers carried the information that the loan was not one of fifty million but of one hundred million. The newspapers also intimated that the negotiations for this loan had been conducted under the supervision and had been closed with the consent of the State Department.

I therefore introduced this resolution, because I considered it of the utmost importance that the Senate should be informed of the foreign policy of the Government of the United States as conducted by the President through the Secretary of State without the advice and consent of the Senate.

When we take into consideration the condition of the world to-day, I think it only the part of prudence to expect that Congress shall keep informed, so far as it can, in order that the Nation's interests may be protected. It would seem also the public duty of the State Department to keep the Senate informed from time to time of matters pertaining to our relations with other countries not only concerning questions of a political nature but also questions of a financial nature, because, sooner or later, financial matters become political and financial entanglements become political entanglements.

I do not like the idea that has been so often reiterated that the "American flag follows the dollar," because that implies that the dollar controls the flag; that the owner of the dollar will then control our foreign policy. I would rather have it said that the "American flag follows American principles and American ideals," and then see to it that these principles and ideals are of such a character that an American need not be ashamed to have his flag follow them. I am aware, however, that there are citizens who hold that the other slogan is a better one and insist that the American flag follow the American dollar. People who apparently hold to that view have had control of the Government, and therefore our foreign policy, for some time, and the American flag has followed the dollar into Haiti, Santo Domingo, Salvador, Honduras, Mexico, and France. There is an ever-increasing number of people in America, however, who are beginning to realize that the American dollar represents the crystallized sweat of American labor. Therefore they are very much concerned as to where these American dollars, wrung by toll out of the bodies of the American people, are going, and for what purpose they are being used. Forty billions of these American dollars were spent with reckless abandon on an experiment called "a war to end war," "a war to end militarism," and a "war that was fought for the purpose of establishing a peace of justice."

The experiment, of course, was a failure, although some people evidently found it so interesting and so profitable that they have forgotten the expense and the sacrifices that it entailed. They also seem to have forgotten the purposes and principles for which we were told we entered the war.

After the war was over we were told that the day we went into the war the British Government had overdrawn its bank account with J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. to the amount of $400,000,000, and did not have the money to "make good" the overdraft; that a few days after we entered the war this money was taken out of the Federal Treasury of the United States and deposited in the bank of J. Pierpont Morgan. (See article by Burton J. Hendrick in World's Work for September, 1922, and article by Oscar T. Crosby in Atlantic Monthly, December, 1922.) How much more paper of foreign governments was held in the banks and trust companies affiliated with the Morgan group at that time we have not been informed. But I believe it is reasonable to assume that so many American dollars had found their way to the European battle fields in the shape of war contracts that about $40,000,000,000, 4,000,000 men, and the American flag had to be sent over to protect them. In other words, these loans formed a financial entanglement that later became a political entanglement, which finally led us into the war.

The American bankers had put their money on the Allies to win. They had bet on a losing horse. So they had to rush $40,000,000,000 of the American people's money, and sacrifice 150,000 lives of the "flower of American youth," to fix the horse race so that the horse upon whom they had placed their money could win.

German militarism was destroyed. But we find in its place French militarism. The Government of France, one of the Allies in the late war, whose confession of faith was as laudable and whose ideals for "world peace" were as loudly protested as were those of any ally, or any opposing government, has, since the war, repudiated that confession of faith. She has not kept faith with the United States in adhering to the principles for which we entered the war. She has spent vast sums of money to maintain a large standing army, and for other war purposes, not only in France, but in other countries. And in her attempt to accomplish the hegemony of Europe she has now shed the mantle of justice and peace, and stands revealed to the world clothed in the armor of imperialism and conquest. As such she is a menace to all humanity, endangering the peace of the world.

The French industrialists want iron mines, coal mines, oil wells belonging to other people. To get these things, they use their Government. If through the use of their Government they can not get these things by diplomacy, they resort to force. When governments use force, it means war. That is one of the reasons industrialists are so anxious to control governments, for in controlling governments they can use them and their power to get the things that they want. To get these things they will sacrifice their own people and all humanity on the altar of the god of greed.

I find in the Chicago Tribune the headline, quoting Morgan & Co., to the effect that United States bankers are confident France will win. J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., by his loan, are betting $100,000,000 that France will win in her conquest of Europe. How much more they have bet on France we do not know. An investigation into the amount of French paper held in the American banks and other corporations would give us some light on this subject.

To what extent the American Government is involved in this transaction should be the concern of all Americans, particularly of those who are not interested in oil wells, iron mines, and coal mines, or interest on foreign securities. With our bankrupt farmers, with our tremendous burden of taxes, with our soldiers of the late war without adjusted compensation, with Europe already owing us $10,000,000,000 on their last war, with all of these things in view, it would seem the part of prudence to inquire whither we are now drifting. But it is said this loan is made for the purpose of establishing peace in Europe, for stabilizing the franc, to restore the crumbling financial houses and governments of Europe. It is done "in the name of peace."

We who have so recently been over the course of history ought to remember the danger signals. The war makers always do their work in the "name of peace." When Germany, Austria, and Italy formed their triple alliance and built large armaments on land and sea, they did not say that Germany wanted the Bagdad Railroad in order to tap the markets of the Orient; that Italy wanted more territory; that Austria wanted more territory. They said they formed the alliance and built the large armaments on land and sea because they wanted peace. They told their people so. Their newspapers and statesmen told their people that they must gladly pay the taxes to support this military program in order to have peace.

When Russia, France, and England formed their triple entente, and taxed their people to support large armies and large navies, they did not tell their people that Russia wanted Constantinople in order to control the Black Sea and so possess a harbor on warm water. They did not say that England wanted German colonies and the trade of the Orient, and that in order to keep that trade she must be mistress of the seas. They did not say France wanted the German colonies in Africa and the control of the iron and coal of the European Continent, and that in order to get these things they must have a large army and go to war. No; they did not tell the people that. They told their people that they had to have a large army in order to maintain peace; that the people must gladly pay taxes to support large armies and large navies in order that they might enjoy "peace on earth and good will among men." The people did not get peace. They got war.

Then, after our bankers had loaned vast sums of money to the allied governments, we became obsessed with that same desire for peace that the governments of Europe had shown. A Government that had been "too proud to fight" became so desirous for peace that it decided to go to war, a "war to end war," a "war to annihilate militarism," a war that should put an end to "government by dictators," a war that should bring peace. But there is no peace. There is more militarism than ever. There are more governments by dictators than ever before. Still the voice of humanity is clamoring for peace, and can have no peace because those who control their governments do not want peace. They want oil wells, coal mines, iron mines, and interests on bonds. So they are getting ready for another war in order to "save the white man's civilization."

Can we never learn from history? Hegel says, "The only thing we learn from history is that we are so stupid that we can not learn from history." But we who have lived the last 10 years have seen 100 years of history made within that time. And having seen 100 years of history made in the last 10, we ought to have learned something from history. Having learned something, we surely can see that this frightful game of the world's industrialists in charge of the various governments is not preserving and protecting the white man's civilization but is destroying it.

Shall America, through the loans of its bankers, be again drawn into this maelstrom of destruction that will make another shambles of God's green earth? Shall we again be drafted into the game of selfishness and greed that will multiply the poverty and disease, the misery, the debts, taxes, and death among the white race? Are American statesmen going to continue to be pawns in the hands of its financiers and foreign diplomats? Shall America again be the tail to the kite of an imperial foreign government, to the sacrifice of our own interests and our own people? Is Uncle Sam again going to play the boob at the poker table of international politics? Shall we pile up larger debts and heavier taxes by financing imperial European governments in their game of destruction? If we do, we shall have to pay the price. We shall pay the price that European governments and peoples are paying now.

That price will be paid by the people of America who produce wealth by toil in the mines and in the factories, on the farms and in the shops, for nations, like individuals, must pay for their mistakes. It is for us, who are intrusted by the people with the power of government, to so conduct the affairs of the Government, both in domestic and foreign relations, that the price of our mistakes shall not be the life of the Nation.

NAVAL OIL LAND DEBATES.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I have sat here for almost two days hoping that some Republican Senator would feel compelled to rise in his place and defend the Speaker of the House [Mr. GILLET] against an attack made on him by the New York Times. In an editorial, quoting from the Speaker of the House [Mr. GILLET] in his Massachusetts speech of this week, the New York Times said:

"Mr. GILLET's animadversions on the new senatorial 'types which seem to revel in personalities, which never grapple with policies, but find delight in circulating abuse and besmirching reputations,' and on one bizarre ornament of the Senate, 'inflamed beyond even his usual recklessness by partisan malice,' violate the parliamentary proprieties and traditions."

Then the paper says:

"These ought to be followed even if they are sometimes broken. Severe personal criticism by a Member of one branch of the legislature of the conduct of another, or of Members of it, is not supposed to be made publicly."

I think the New York Times is without justification in its criticism of the Speaker of the House on his violating the proprieties and the rules of the body over which he presides, because I never knew that anyone thought that the Speaker understood or had any regard for the rules of the body over which he presides. He never has given any evidence that he knew what the rules were or that he had any respect for them. Therefore I think some Republican Member of the Senate should have rebuked the New York Times for criticizing the Speaker for doing a thing which the Speaker did not know was wrong.

Speaking of the Senate, the Speaker said:

"I wish the stature of its Members had kept pace. It still has wise statesmen, but they are not the ones who of late have filled the columns of the Record. There have recently come into prominence new types which seem to revel in personalities, which never grapple with policies but find delight in circulating abuse and besmirching reputations."

I want to ask the Speaker if he will be so good, when he goes again to Massachusetts to lecture the Senate, if he will tell the country which Members of the Senate he thinks are violating the best traditions of the Senate. I wish the Speaker would do more than that. That applies to all those, both individuals and papers, including the New York Times and the Washington Star and the Philadelphia Ledger and others, that are moved by sinister interests to cry out against investigations. I wish they would tell the country, when they are bemoaning the investigations that are going on in the Senate and decrying the motives of Senators who carry on the investigations, just what it is that has been revealed by those investigations that they do not approve.

Are they disturbed and is the Speaker upset because Fall was disclosed as a traitor who had sold the oil reserves of the country for a consideration? Are they angry because the Attorney General now stands stripped before the American people as a man who perverted his office to protect crime and to profit by the sale of permits to violate the law? Is that the thing that moves the Speaker of the House to criticize the Senate and to decry the efforts put forth by certain Senators to uncover corruption in this country? Does he object to the testimony that discloses that the whiskey ring in this country had bought withdrawal permits for hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of liquor and paid to people near the Attorney General for the privilege to bootleg this liquor? Is that what he objects to?

Or does he object, and do the papers who criticize the Senate object, that Forbes is no longer the Director of the Veterans' Bureau and therefore not in a position to rob and plunder the disabled and maimed soldiers of the recent war? Are those the things that disturb the Speaker? Are those the things that fill the newspapers with their denunciations of investigations going on in the Senate?

I would like to say that the distinguished and very able senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who has added so much to the legislative success of his party since he has been in the Senate, says he is coming back from Florida and make the fur fly on Democrats who have been carrying on investigations in the Senate. Oh, it would be a revelation to some of us to see him do anything in the Senate. His activities do not seem to have been carried on on the floor of the Senate if the investigating committee's report can be relied upon.

I am not inclined to let pass without discussion another thing. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BONAR] said he wanted to call the attention of the Senate that it ought to quit its grand-jury probing and go to work. I would like to yield now to any Senator who will tell the country one single piece of legislation that has not been acted upon by the Senate by reason of the fact that there is an investigation going on. The tax bill, to which the Senator from Idaho referred, is right where it would have been if there had been no Senate investigation. The Senate could not take hold of it until the House acted upon it, and the House only recently passed it. The Senate can not pass it until the Committee on Finance shall have reported it to the Senate. Therefore, when anyone says that the Senate investigations are delaying legislation I would be glad for him to point out what particular legislation is being delayed by reason of the Senate investigations.

There is no use, because people have no sympathy with investigations, because they would rather that crime should go unpunished and undiscovered, to say that the country is being deprived of helpful legislation by reason of the fact that the Senate is engaged in investigating criminals.

The Washington Star recently had an editorial that I want to read. I presume that no editorial that ever appeared in that paper was read on the floor of the Senate before. It was entitled "Speaking of politics," and is as follows:

When President Coolidge said that "guilt is personal" he made a sapient observation with an application bearing upon the general political situation. Events are rapidly justifying the statement, especially with regard to the Republican Party's interests and his own candidacy for the Presidency. It has been the hope of the Democrats that the disclosures in the oil investigation and the inquiry into the Department of Justice, now pending, would diminish the prospects of the Republican Party and even impair those of President Coolidge getting the nomination.

The administration's prompt action in the possible criminal aspects of the Teapot Dome affair, already yielding results, relieved the President and the party of any charge of dilatoriness or of trying to shield any Republican involved. Demonstration of the country's faith in President Coolidge has been made in recent elections for the selection of delegates by the selection of Coolidge delegates in widely separated sections over his only opponent.

There is reaction from the first horrifying shock over the oil disclosures as the investigation takes on such a partisan status disclosing political animus. There is further reaction on account of the character of the probe. One hears comment from the man in the street expressing impatience over the scope of the inquiry and with the development of so much that seems immaterial politically.

The political drive is not registering effectiveness. There is evidence that against the time when the elections come on politics will still be politics along old lines, and the two parties will go to the polls facing normal issues, and perhaps a third entry.

Let the Star say what it is that the investigation has disclosed that the country objects to. Let the Star say what criminal has been uncovered that the Star objects to. Let the Philadelphia Ledger, that was horrified at disclosures made and so out of patience with the Senate, tell the country just what criminal it wanted protected or just what criminal is about to be uncovered whose protection it seeks, because, Mr. President, I know and every thinking man knows that nobody decries the activity of the Senate in the investigations now going on unless there has been some criminal uncovered whom he wanted to protect or there is some crime about to be disclosed which he does not want revealed.

There is no use to raise the cry that the country wants legislation because there is nobody familiar with the legislative situation who does not know and absolutely know that there is not a single piece of legislation that has been delayed one day by reason of the investigations.

Nobody tells a falsehood unless it becomes necessary, and therefore when the papers and interests outside of the Senate complain about the investigation as delaying legislation or shaking the confidence of the people in their Government it is because there is some reason that they do not dare to tell the people why they object to the investigation. Do they object to it because it has disclosed the fact that Ed McLean did not tell the truth when he said he loaned Mr. Fall $100,000? Do they object to it because the investigation disclosed that Fall, in his hunt for somebody who would lie for him, before he found McLean had tried to get McKinney? Do they object because Homer wired McLean to "make haste and put in your wire so that you can have quick and easy access to the White House"? Do they object to it because Wahlberg, who said he had $68,000 of canceled checks in his possession that Sinclair had given to Fall's ranch foreman in New Mexico, later said it was only six or eight cows that he was talking about, and has now run away from the country to keep from answering further about the cows that he had canceled?

Do they object to it because Bennett, the editor of the Post, had such a treacherous memory that he did not know anything that was true and undertook to blacken the reputation of a Member of the Senate who occupies a political position diametrically opposite to me—I speak of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. Curtis]—by swearing that he meant Curtis in his telegram when he said "principal"? I know that is not true.

Everybody that reads it knows it is a lie. I started to say about Mr. Curtis that he is a Republican. I am a Democrat. We occupy as radically different positions politically as any two men could, and yet I know that everyone who knows Curtis knows that Curtis does not lie; that he is an honest and honorable man; and that they seek to besmirch his reputation to conceal somebody else's activities under the word "principal"; we know that the truth has not been told. I know that Curtis was not the "principal" and everybody else knows it, and yet because there is some comment made on who is the principal we are criticized for it. I know that Curtis was not the principal.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. What does the Senator mean by "principal"—principal of what?

Mr. CARAWAY. The witnesses testified about that. The Senator is a member of the committee, and he ought to have some little idea about it.

Mr. STANFIELD. I have an idea, but I would like to be enlightened. I would like to have the Senator's version of the word, because the Senator talks a great deal about the word "principal."

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator were not so active in trying to keep witnesses from answering questions, we might get more information. Everybody knows that CHARLIE CURTIS was not the principal. Everybody knows that Bennett knew he was not. Everybody knows that CURTIS is an honest man. Everybody knows that whoever was referred to as "principal" was helping Fall to cover up evidence of his sale of the oil reserves and also was trying to keep Ed McLean from testifying. We know that.

Oh, well, we were criticized also because we called attention to the fact that the President sent a wire to Ed McLean in Florida and afterwards said he did it because McLean had congratulated him on his Lincoln Day speech when he had not delivered his Lincoln Day speech and did not do so until six hours later. Then the President said it was to congratulate him about his stand on Denby. He had already decided to drop Denby. So, of course, we know another explanation should be made.

Then when the President had to hunt up his private secretary, Mr. Slomp, in Florida, he wired Ed McLean. It was 9.30 at night, and his other help, he said, had gone to bed, or something of the kind.

Of course, at the White House they go to bed at 6 o'clock. But the help would be back on the job the next morning at 9. As I understand, the explanation was that he wanted to talk to somebody about whom he should appoint as Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Everybody knows that he was not going to call up somebody here in the District of Columbia at 9.30 at night and ask who should be appointed Commissioners of the District of Columbia when the appointment was not to be made for a month, and his clerk would be in the office the next morning. And then because we simply ask questions about it we are denounced.

Let the people who have the information give it to the country, and there then will be no occasion to ask questions. There will be no occasion for the Speaker of the House to go to Massachusetts and regret the new type of Senators who have come into the Senate. There will be no occasion for the papers to complain about delaying legislation because a grand jury is sitting in the Senate, because, as I said a moment ago, nobody can truthfully say that there has been one day of delay in any legislation by reason of the "grand jury" in the Senate.

But I should like further to call the Speaker's attention to a fact. Quoting now from the newspaper published on the day after his speech, he said that the Senate was a veritable school for scandal. Well, I should like for him to tell the country that his party furnished the scandal.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. Does the Senator think that the discourse he is now delivering is constructive and is aiding in constructive legislation, or is it delaying the time of the Senate from the consideration of constructive legislation and such legislation as the people are interested in, or is the Senator making a speech for the purpose of prejudicing the mind of the public politically?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, well, Mr. President, I do not answer such questions as that. Whenever a man asks me that sort of a question his motive is so plain that everybody knows it; and if he does not find it out himself there is no use wasting time. If the Senator has sat on a committee here for months and does not know what I am talking about, he ought to resign from the committee and let somebody who has some sympathy with the efforts and aims of the committee take his place.

Mr. STANFIELD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. STANFIELD. I take exception to the aspersion of the Senator from Arkansas as to myself and my interest in the committee. I wish to say to the Senate that there is no Member of this body who has taken more interest than I have taken in the work of the committee when any revolutions have been made. I do take exception to the Senator's statement—

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, let me ask a question while the Senator is taking exception. Who objected this morning to Will Hays telling whether or not Sinclair had financed the Republican Party?

Mr. STANFIELD. I do not think such a question was propounded to the committee or such an objection was made before the committee.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who objected to his answering any questions about the contributions to the Republican committee?

Mr. STANFIELD. There were various members of the committee who objected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who made the objection?

Mr. STANFIELD. I made an objection to the question—

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator did, and I am glad we have found it out. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries will not be permitted to indulge in any demonstrations.

Mr. STANFIELD. I made objection to certain questions on the ground of immateriality and irrelevancy. I was within my rights when I did so, because I think a great deal of time is being wasted by the committee. I think the Public Lands Committee has many serious matters to consider, and I did not want to see the time of the committee taken in matters that are immaterial and irrelevant and are not before them, so far as the resolution adopted by the Senate is concerned.

Mr. CARAWAY. I remember when I submitted a resolution to cancel the oil leases which Fall had sold to Sinclair and Doheny a Senator on the other side objected to its immediate consideration. I remember when I gave notice that I would ask to have the committee discharged a member of the committee sitting on the Republican side objected. I remember that in answer to the speech I made seeking action upon this matter the suggestion was made that it was a reflection on the committee. I remember that I was taken to task because I had said that Fall was guilty of treason in selling the national resources. I was called a scandal monger; and, if it could have been done by those who had no sympathy with the investigation, Doheny and Sinclair would still be exploiting the oil reserves of this country and they would still be contributing to the Republican National Committee and electing men in sympathy with them; hiring the ex-Cabinet officials—and some of them who were not "ex"—to carry out their policies, and the country would have been none the wiser. Everybody knows what I am trying to do here except the Senator from Oregon.

I say, Mr. President, that whoever has been guilty of wrongdoing ought to be punished, and whoever has been guilty of transactions that raise a serious question in the minds of the people as to his motive ought, if he is innocent, to welcome an opportunity to explain it.

I should think if the Attorney General thought it was entirely proper to gamble in Sinclair and Doheny oil stocks—Sinclair stock particularly, as I remember—at the time Sinclair was negotiating and just had purchased the Teapot Dome from the Government that he would have carried the stock in his own name; that he would not have had a dummy. I do not know what right anyone has now to complain when it is disclosed that Smith, who never pretended to be a lawyer, but was merely a dry-goods man, was brought to Washington with Daugherty and installed in an office next to him, and in the absence of the Attorney General, so the testimony shows, sat in the Attorney General's office. But naturally questions arise, Mr. President, about the reason for bringing a merchant away from his store and installing him in the Department of Justice, and those questions have been accentuated by testimony that has recently been disclosed before the investigating committees that are so much denounced. It has been shown that Smith was the man one should see if he wanted to transport a prize-fight film in violation of law; that Smith was the man one should see if he wanted a permit to withdraw liquor illegally so that it might be turned over to the bootleggers of this country, and that a man—I will inquire of the Senator from Montana the name of the lawyer who did not have any law practice, but got money from the bootleggers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. His name was Mannington.

Mr. CARAWAY. The country has the right to know, Mr. President, of the activities of Mannington and Muma and Thomas B. Felder and a few men like that, and those who seek to stifle that knowledge are going to arouse in the minds of many people the suspicion that they do not want the facts disclosed; that there is some criminal they want protected; there is some criminal interest there disclosed about which they are angry or is about to be disclosed, and they are hoping for silence. Therefore I do not purpose to sit here and have the presiding officer at the other end of the Capitol denounce Members of the Senate for their activities in this matter without replying to him. I should like to have him tell me if he is angry because Fall was uncovered as a traitor, or if he is angry because Daugherty has been shown to be a protector of criminals instead of a punisher of crime, or if he is angry because, by reason of the disclosures made in the Senate investigations, Forbes can no longer rob the disabled soldiers, or if he is angry because witnesses are testifying now that the Secretary of the Treasury seems to have been overkind to himself when it comes to remitting taxes or making refunds. If those things excite his anger, I shall not question him further; but unless they do, Mr. President, he owes the people some explanation, for those are the things which the Senate investigation has disclosed, those are the things about which Senators speak here on the floor. For doing that the Speaker has denounced us in his Massachusetts speech.

We want him to answer; and recurring again to the newspapers that have said that this investigation has gone too far, that the people are tired of it, that everybody now wants us to sit down and pass the Mellon plan and defeat the soldiers' bonus and go home, they have some other interest, and they had as well disclose it, for there has not been, I want to repeat, any delay of legislation by reason of these investigations or the discussion thereon. There has not been a bill yet brought to the floor of the Senate this session that has not received prompt consideration when the Senators who were in charge of it desired it. The Republican Party is in charge of this Government, and whenever they have desired a measure discussed and passed, it has been promptly done. No Senator on this side of the Chamber has undertaken to delay legislation, and I do not say that any Senator on the other side has done so; but I am showing how unjust it is to try to make the people of the country believe that these investigations are robbing them of needed legislation; that we are holding back the tax reduction bill or any other measure, for there is not any evidence upon which such a statement can rest. Therefore, to repeat, I think that those who make these statements ought to come from under cover and state what their real motives are.

Again, my good friend from West Virginia, without whose intelligent direction of affairs in the Senate there could be no successful legislation—

Mr. NEELY. To which Senator from West Virginia does the Senator from Arkansas refer?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am speaking of the Senator from West Virginia who says he is going to "make the fur fly" when he comes back here. I am speaking of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I wish to read that classic of his. If I have lost it, I shall always regret it. Anyway, it was a threat that as soon as he arrived, after having gotten oriented, he is going to make all Democratic Senators exceedingly sorry that in his absence in Florida they loafed upon the job; that he had heard just about as much of this investigation as he was going to stand, and it was not anybody's business what anybody did. It was a fair warning that he was coming back to the Senate to make everybody rue the day when resolutions were offered in the Senate to investigate anybody for wrongdoing.

Mr. President, there may be in the minds of some people a belief that these investigations are partisan. That is what the Star says. However, the majority of the committee is Republican, the Senator who was its chairman until recently is as ardent a partisan as I have ever known. Many of its members are partisan Republicans; but I do not mean by that that they are not fair. I simply want to show how foolish it is for any silly anywhere to say that the Democrats could manipulate the committee for partisan reasons, because the Democrats were in the minority; they could not have a meeting of the committee without the consent of the majority. If there has been any wrongdoing by Democrats, the Republicans know it, and, if they are not very much changed from what they were in 1920, they would not hesitate to criticize a Democrat.

When they came into power in 1918 in the House and in 1920 in the Senate they instigated sixty-odd investigations and spent millions of dollars hoping to disclose that there had been corruption in the administration that waged the war. If there had been they would have revealed it, and if there had been they ought to have done so.

I do not care whether a man is a Democrat or a Republican, if he has been unfaithful to his trust, and anybody knows it and does not reveal it he is not a good citizen. If there is any reason to believe that Democrats have been dishonest, a man can not be honest who does not try to disclose that fact. On the other hand, if the investigation shows that there have been some Republicans who have not been honest in office, no honest Republican is going to complain because that fact has been made known.

Therefore I hope that the next person who criticizes the Senate will at least at the same time enlighten the country upon just those things that investigating committees have brought to light against which he protests. I want him to tell the country whether he objects because the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] brought to light the fact that Forbes was robbing the crippled soldiers of this country. I want him to say whether he objects because it has been brought to the country's attention that Fall was a traitor and sold the national resources. I want him to say whether he objects because it has been disclosed that Daugherty, the Attorney General, was harboring in his office men who were trafficking in permits to violate the law. I should like to have him say whether he objects to the country knowing that the Cabinet met at the house of the moral and intellectual leader of this administration, Mr. McLean, and viewed fight films brought here in violation of the law. If it was wrong to do those things, Mr. President, why is it wrong to have the public know, and if it was not wrong to do it, why do they object to letting the people know.

DISTRICT GASOLINE TAX—BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, for the immediate consideration of House bill 655, Order of Business No. 282.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the title of the bill be read first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 655) to provide for a tax on motor-vehicle fuels sold within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know whether there are any amendments to this bill or not. This is an important bill to the people of the District. There is one provision of it that exempts automobile owners from taxation, and I do not think I can give my consent to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill. I think it had better be read. I think the Senate had better know what is in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the Senate with any extended remarks relative to the subject which has been under discussion by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. He made some reference, however, to the views which I expressed a day or two since with reference to speeding up legislation, which perhaps makes it appropriate for me to say something more on that subject.

Lest I forget it, I want to say at this time that I quite agree with the Senator from Arkansas as to his views in regard to the nonpartisan conduct of the investigation relating to the Teapot Dome matter. Without referring to others, I think that the leading Democrat upon that committee has conducted the investigation with impartiality, without partisanship, and with extraordinary ability; and so far as I am concerned I want to go on record as believing that the investigation has been conducted upon high lines and without partisan purposes. I join with them in that proposition.

Mr. President, the other day I called attention to the fact that we have been in session three months and a half and that practically no important legislation has been enacted. I stated at the same time that so far as the committees were concerned which had these matters under investigation they should proceed to their conclusion and make such investigations as the committees deemed it proper to make, but that ought not to interfere any longer or at all with the proper consideration and disposition of legislative matters. I contended then, and I contend now, that the investigations can proceed and that we can, if we will to do so, proceed here with legislation. It is not legitimate investigation of which I complain and the waste of time here in the Senate.

The Senator from Arkansas says that no one can truthfully say that these investigations have delayed legislation. So far as the investigations proper are concerned, I might entirely agree with the Senator from Arkansas; but I do think that by reason of the investigations we here in the Senate Chamber have unnecessarily directed our attention to those matters rather than to the matter of legislation. I have no doubt that our conduct here has delayed legislation.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. What bill is it that would have been considered if we had gone on without these investigations?

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that there are several bills which would have been here for consideration; the whole field of legislation has been delayed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Are they on the calendar?

Mr. BORAH. They may not be on the calendar now, although some are. But committee work has been delayed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then the investigations or what happened here on the floor did not delay the committee work, did they?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator knows quite well that when a subject matter is receiving the attention of the Senate other matters are not considered in committee or pushed along, because our minds and time are upon another subject, and the presence of quorums in committees and the consideration of matters here are inevitably interfered with, not by the acts of individuals, but the body itself, by reason of giving its attention to other matters. Delay is inevitable. If we had been content to let the committees go ahead and withheld discussion here until something in the nature of reports had been made, undoubtedly legislation would not have been retarded. But we have been debating, to the delay of legislation, when the subject matter of investigation was still before the committees.

The consideration of these measures need not interfere with the work of the several committees which are doing this work. When the reports come in from the committees, if there is anything submitted to us here for consideration it will be entirely proper for us to consider and dispose of it; but in the meantime we are under the highest obligations to the country and to ourselves to push these legislative matters and to present them here as rapidly as possible and to dispose of them as speedily as possible.

We have been here, as I have said, for three months and a half, and no such condition of affairs ever before prevailed. It must be due, of course, to the fact that our attention has been riveted upon other matters; but we can afford, in view of the progress which has been made with reference to the investigations, so far as the Senate Chamber is concerned, until the reports come in, to devote our attention to the question of legislation, and it need not interfere with the investigations at all.

As I said the other day in making these remarks, I was not speaking to the opposite side of the Chamber; I was speaking principally to those who are responsible for legislation, who are in power.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. There are some of us over here, of course, who want to cooperate and expedite the passage of wholesome legislation. May I ask the Senator what there is on the program of the majority party in the Senate that they intend to pass at this time in the form of legislation?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I can not speak for anybody except myself. I have certain bills in mind—tax reduction, farm relief, immigration, and so forth.

Mr. HARRISON. I was curious to know just what the program is, what bills they want to expedite.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Mississippi knows that the Senator from Idaho is not familiar with programs. I do not wait for or wait upon programs.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator from Idaho was familiar with everything.

Mr. BORAH. I have in view, however, certain measures which I am exceedingly anxious to see passed.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senate itself can not agree upon a program until bills are reported from the committees and are on the calendar.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not understand what the Senator said.

Mr. CURTIS. I say that the Senate can not agree upon a program as to what bills will be taken up until bills are reported out from committees.

Mr. HARRISON. That is very true, but the Republican side of the Chamber controls by a majority number of Senators each committee.

Mr. CURTIS. The members of every committee would have to speak for themselves.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I am going to do. That is what I am doing, and I am going to continue to do it until we get down to legislation.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, I suggest that there is one bill on the calendar that ought to have been taken up long ago, and that is the pension bill. I should like to inquire why it has not been given consideration.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it will be a long time before it will be passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no need of our fooling ourselves. We are not fooling the country a particle. The country knows that if we, as a body, regardless of politics and regardless of party, were as anxious to pass legislation as the country is to have us pass it, this legislation would be passed. We may be fooling ourselves but we are not fooling the people.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I quite agree with his thought along that line. We are all interested, for instance, as the Senator mentioned the other day, in tax reduction. How can the Senator account for the statement which appears in the metropolitan papers this morning that the leaders on the other side who have the confidence of the President state that we can not have this tax bill until after the recess?

Mr. BORAH. After what recess?

Mr. FLETCHER. After the recess of Congress. I do not know what recess is referred to. I presume the idea is that we are to have a recess some time in June, or about the 1st of June.

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is that if we do not do something we will have something more than a recess.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why should we wait until after the recess to act upon that very important matter?

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have not read the account in the newspaper, but I want to state that there is absolutely no foundation for any such report. The Committee on Finance is working every day upon a revenue bill, and expects to get it out at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The morning papers carried a report that on yesterday the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], and other distinguished members of the same committee—I am not sure that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Curtis] was among them; if not, his absence was their misfortune—had positively informed the President that under no possible condition could the tax reduction bill be considered and disposed of prior to the recess. I take it he meant the recess which would become necessary in order to hold the Republican convention, which assembles on the 10th of June.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. The statement was made and given publicity throughout the United States that the chairman of the Committee on Finance, one of the leaders of the majority in this body, has declared to the President that it is a physical impossibility to secure the passage of this legislation before the recess. I want to say, Mr. President, that if the Finance Committee will bring in the tax reduction bill, the Senate will take it up and dispose of it within two short weeks, in all probability.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. There is not the slightest disposition on this side of the Chamber to delay the consideration and disposition of that bill, and if it is not passed before the recess occurs, if it is not passed before the next election, the fault will be attributable to the majority, led by the Senator from Utah, the chairman of the committee, who stated to the President yesterday that it is impossible to pass it before the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I do not yield now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I understood that the Senator from Arkansas was through.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had concluded for the present.

Mr. BORAH. It is the last sentence of the able Senator from Arkansas which, as I indicated the other day, we will hear more about in the coming campaign if the Republicans do not take hold of the matter and shove legislation through this body. We are in power. We are responsible for legislation. We are responsible for this situation. We shall have to answer to the constituency of this country for whatever is done and whatever we fail to do, and when we come to the campaign we will hear very little about anything except the fact that there was no legislation, that we were in power, and that we are responsible for having no legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. If you will take the time which has been devoted to the discussion of matters wholly aside from legislation, the hours and hours that have been devoted to it, you will see very easily why we have not been able to make progress with this legislation. I am making this suggestion, not as a criticism upon the other side of the Chamber alone, but I am making the suggestion to the Senate as a whole, that if we want legislation we know that it is within our power to pass legislation, and the country knows that it is within our power to do it, and they will not be deceived for a single moment if we do not do it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to state that I heartily agree with the statement made by the Senator from Idaho. The responsibility is with us. If we want to pass legislation, we can do it. But I wanted to correct what the Senator from Arkansas claims he read from the paper. I was present at that conference, and I will say that no such conversation as reported in the newspaper and read upon the floor of the Senate occurred. There was nothing said about when the revenue bill should be passed. The President simply urged that we get the bill out and pass it as soon as possible, so that the people of the country might know what they could expect in the way of reduction of taxation. As a member of the Committee on Finance, I want to say that the committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, are meeting every morning at 10 o'clock and considering that bill, and we want to get it out, and expect to report it at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho be good enough to yield?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas, but after that I would like to conclude.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator would prefer to conclude his remarks first—

Mr. BORAH. No; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have already referred to the announcement in the morning press that the chairman of the Committee on Finance has informed the President that it will be impossible to pass the tax reduction bill prior to the recess of Congress, which it is expected will be taken in order to hold the Republican National Convention on the 10th of June. I quote from the Washington Post, which is admittedly an administration organ.

Mr. BORAH. Who makes that admission?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Idaho will certainly not deny it, being a Senator of more than ordinary information.

Mr. BORAH. I think I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is the only Senator who will deny it, and there is no one outside of the Chamber familiar with the course of recent political events who will corroborate the viewpoint indicated in the Senator's statement. The Washington Post says:

President Coolidge is taking an active hand in speeding up legislation in both Houses of Congress in order to bring about adjournment before the national conventions are held. At a dinner-conference at the White House last night the President discussed with members of the steering committee phases of legislation now before the House and Senate.

Those who took part in the conference were Representative LONGWORTH, Republican leader; Chairman MADDEN, of the Appropriations Committee; Chairman SNELL, of the Rules Committee; and Representatives DARROW, of Pennsylvania; SANDERS, of Indiana; ANDERSON, of Minnesota; MAGEE, of New York; GRAHAM, of Illinois; TINCER, of Kansas; and SINNOTT, of Oregon, members of the steering committee.

Earlier in the day Senators SMOOT and CURTIS had an extended conference with the Chief Executive. The whole legislative program was gone over.

Now I ask the Senator if he will yield to me to inquire of the Senator from Kansas what the legislative program is. Let us find out now what legislation the majority propose to consider and pass, and what the program discussed with the President was.

Mr. BORAH. Would not the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Arkansas be willing to take up that discussion after I have concluded?

Mr. ROBINSON. I can conclude in a moment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I can answer the question. I will state that the measure discussed was the revenue bill, and the legislative program was not discussed.

Mr. ROBINSON. The only measure discussed then was the revenue bill, and it appears now, from the statement of the Senator from Kansas, that the majority have no program, unless it is the passage of the tax reduction bill. But let me proceed for just a moment, and then I will not trespass further on the patience of my good friend the Senator from Idaho. I read further from the article in the Washington Post:

The whole legislative program was gone over, but the tax bill came in for the most earnest discussion. Senator SMOOT, it is understood, told the President that while he would like to agree with the Chief Executive's view that Congress will have cleared decks in time to adjourn for the conventions, conditions at this time certainly do not warrant such a view.

The President is understood to have pressed Senators SMOOT and CURTIS to use every effort to expedite legislation, particularly the tax bill. The Senate has passed three of the appropriation bills, including the deficiency bill yesterday. Mr. Coolidge told the Senators and members of the steering committee of the House that he is desirous of cooperating in every way he can to facilitate legislation, that there may be adjournment at a reasonable date. He has been told that all of the appropriation bills are substantially ready to be reported to the House.

The article goes on to say that the President thinks Congress can clear the decks and thinks that the tax reduction bill can be passed, but the chairman of the Committee on Finance, which has charge of that bill in the Senate, is firmly of the conviction that it is impossible.

Mr. BORAH. It may be that the chairman of the Committee on Finance entertains that view, but the Senator from Arkansas knows full well that if the Senate makes up its mind to dispose of three or four of these bills we can convince the Senator from Utah that his pessimistic view is ill founded.

Mr. President, of course I do not know that there is any particular program in view, but we all know that there are certain things to which we are all committed, Democrats and Republicans alike, the Farm-Labor men as well, that there are three or four prominent measures which we came here to dispose of at this session, and which we will not dispose of if we proceed as we have been proceeding for the last three months and a half.

Let us take the case of tax reduction. It does not necessarily follow, as suggested by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], that it is the Mellon proposition which we will pass. What we propose to do, I presume, is to pass a bill embodying the principles of tax reduction which will meet the approval of the Senate rather than meet the approval of any particular individual. I do not know how others are, but I am not committed to the details of Mr. Mellon's bill; but I am committed, we are all committed, and the country is exceedingly anxious that we proceed, to the consideration of a tax reduction bill. If the Mellon bill is thought undesirable, it is within our power to pass such bill as we think is proper; but tax reduction is a thing upon which we are all agreed, as I understand.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, the Senator recalls that the Mellon plan was repudiated, in its most substantial features, by a majority of the body at the other end of the Capitol, and that the bill which came to the Senate was a radically different bill from the Mellon plan, so different that it has been said that the President contemplates vetoing it if the Congress should pass it and sends it to him for his signature. I do not think, however, there is any probability of the President pursuing that course.

Mr. BORAH. No; Mr. President, if the President wants to veto any bill which we pass, that is the President's business. I am not worrying about that at all. What I am worrying about is that if we proceed as we have been proceeding we will not give him an opportunity to veto anything, and it looks as if we were not going to give him an opportunity to approve anything.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator does not contend that discussions in the Senate or before the committees have delayed consideration of the revenue bill by the Senate, does he?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that they have, because the revenue bill has not been over here a great while; but it is apparent that if we continue as we have been proceeding heretofore, it will be delayed.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate can not consider the revenue bill until it is reported by the Committee on Finance. The Senate could take up the revenue bill now if the committee had found it consistent to report it a day or two ago.

Mr. BORAH. The chairman of the Committee on Finance has been one of the leading members in one of these investigations, and it is perfectly apparent that he can not attend to both that and to the tax-reduction proposition. As I said, it seems to me that we could lay down this settled proposition to ourselves, that these committees proceed with these investigations and make them as thorough and complete as the committees desire to make them, but that in the meantime the different measures which are here for consideration, and which are to come along for consideration, should receive the attention of the Senate until such time as reports of the committees upon these investigations come in. In that way we could discharge our duty with reference to the investigations, and meet our obligations with respect to legislation. I see no objection to that. I see no obstacle in our way to completing both the programs, if we will make up our minds to do so. Certainly neither the Democrats nor the Republicans want to adjourn this session without lifting a part of the tax burden, if it is possible for them to do it. Certainly they do not want to adjourn this session without granting some relief to the agricultural interests, if it is possible to do so. Measures looking to those ends will take some time to dispose of, and we ought to be about the work as soon and as speedily as possible.

There is another matter which should be disposed of, which is not of such prime concern to eastern Senators, but which is of concern to the western Senators, the question with reference to legislation touching relief for farmers on reclamation projects. It involves the interests of thousands and hundreds of thousands of farmers, and any Senator who lives in the West, it does not make any difference how much he may be interested in the investigations which are here going on, when he opens his mail almost any morning and reads the messages from those people on those reclamation projects, must come to the conclusion that we have a duty there to perform of the very utmost importance to a large body of our citizens.

I do not say that these investigations have up to this time delayed this matter, although it would be very easily argued that a number of the Senators who are engaged in these investigations are the Senators upon whom we must depend for the other work in the committees in reference to these particular subjects. I do not say that. What I undertook to say the other day, and what I now repeat, is that unless we make up our minds to address ourselves to legislation we will be precisely in the same position on the 1st day of June that we find ourselves in on the 22d day of March, 1924.

Mr. President, I am not going to pursue this matter further at this time. I only wish to say that from day to day and from time to time I shall feel under obligation to call attention to matters which appear upon the calendar and which ought to be disposed of, not with a view of criticizing anyone who has a particular subject in mind or a particular duty to perform, as he views it, but rather with a view, if possible, of speeding up legislation and getting some results in this session of Congress. I shall continue to urge that we set about the business of legislation and give relief to the taxpayers and the agricultural situation.

Mr. BAILL. Mr. President, I trust the Senate will proceed with and dispose of this reciprocity bill. We have taken up two hours in telling each other the importance of legislating. Now I trust that in the next three minutes we can legislate. On the 31st day of this month reciprocity between Maryland and the District of Columbia will expire unless some bill of this kind is passed. The House passed a bill, amendments to which have been recommended by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia. The bill will have to go back to the House. Unless we pass it within the next few days, of course the extension given by the Governor of Maryland will expire. I ask if we can not proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Edge in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not ask the Senator to yield. The Senator had concluded his remarks, and I desire to take the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Delaware concluded?

Mr. BALL. I am only asking that we proceed and pass the bill if possible. We have only about two minutes left.

Mr. ROBINSON. We will proceed in regular order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that at any time this afternoon he can ask unanimous consent to pass the bill. We are discussing a matter here now upon which some of us want to be heard.

Mr. BALL. Of course, I understand that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business will be taken up, and we have only about a minute left now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, an important bill like this could not be passed in a minute, I assure the Senator, because some amendments are to be offered to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Delaware yielded the floor?

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Delaware has several times yielded the floor. The Chair has been unable to recognize that fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, of course it is impossible in a minute or two minutes to pass a measure of the importance of House bill 655. Its consideration, however, can be secured, if not to-day, at a very early day and a fair disposition then made of it.

Let me take occasion at this time to say that the minority in the Senate has not pursued a course either designed or calculated to delay or prevent the consideration of legislation in the Senate. There has been, however, a total lack of ability on the part of the majority in the Senate to formulate and bring forward a program or to define a policy of legislation in this body. Senators who have complained this morning that investigations in progress before the various committees of the Senate are delaying the passage of necessary legislation have not been able to state a single measure the consideration of which has been deferred by the Senate for any cause. The sole reason why legislation has lagged is that the majority has not known what legislation it wants to have considered and has not brought forward the measures which it proposes to enact. The truth is now that with the exception of the tax reduction bill the majority has no program. I asked the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] about a minute ago what is the legislative program of the majority.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator ought to be fair.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator certainly would not interrupt me to imply that I am not?

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator certainly would take advantage of an opportunity to take the floor in his own time to do that.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not intend to be unfair to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly not. I am not supersensitive.

Mr. CURTIS. A moment ago I said that we could not very well determine what measures would be considered until bills are reported out from the committees.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has had a great deal of experience with legislation, and he knows that the usual practice is to determine what measures will be brought forward and then see that the committees give consideration and report those measures to the Senate. That is the plan that is usually pursued. If the Senator desires to say that his party can not formulate a legislative program until all the committees have concluded their labors and brought in all the bills and that they propose to determine then just what measures shall be considered, he must know that there never will be a legislative program formulated.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not what the Senator intended at all. Of course, the Senator from Arkansas knows that there is certain legislation intended to be passed, but the bills can not be determined upon until the reports come from the committees. The committees are working on the bills. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry meet every day in the consideration of agricultural legislation. It is the intention, of course, to enact agricultural relief legislation. They are trying now to agree upon such a measure.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator take the position that the investigations in progress in the Senate have delayed legislation and prevented its consideration?

Mr. CURTIS. I have not said so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like the Senator's viewpoint. I would like to have him say.

Mr. CURTIS. I have said, and I say again, that the President has recommended certain legislation, and whenever the committees report bills they will be taken up; but the committee on order of business can not say that this bill or that bill will be taken up until bills are on the calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. No.

Mr. CURTIS. They can urge the committees, as has been done, to report the bills.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator tell us what bills the committees have been urged to report as a part of the legislative program? That is exactly the information I have been trying to secure.

Mr. CURTIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have been urged time and time again, and they are meeting every day, as they will tell the Senator, to formulate some satisfactory measure to give relief to agriculture.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, the measure has not even been formulated. That is the extent of the majority's legislative program respecting relief for agriculture. Now, the session has progressed for three months and yet the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has not even formulated a measure that is to constitute the majority's program with reference to relief of agriculture.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, yes; Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. That exposes and discloses the true state of facts with reference to the situation.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBINSON. The majority does not know what it wants to do, and therefore I declare it has no legislative program. I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator is not justified in making the statement he has made. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] has a measure upon the calendar. It has not been taken up because the committee is considering several amendments to the measure. It would not be fair to force that measure for consideration until the amendments are determined upon. The Finance Committee is meeting every day and so are other committees.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order that we may be specific, is the McNary-Haugen bill, to which the Senator has just referred, a part of the administration legislative program?

Mr. CURTIS. That I could not tell the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now I think I have developed the further fact that even the Senator from Kansas, who knows everything that is to be known concerning the business of the Senate, has not the slightest idea of what constitutes the majority's legislative program for the relief of the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. All this means simply that the majority has no program, and I make the further statement that it will not develop one. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I was merely going to say that we might let the Senator from Arkansas and one or two of us over here make the program on the McNary-Haugen bill and put it through.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, Mr. President, I am talking now about the majority program. The Senator from Idaho apparently admits that the majority has no policy and appeals to me that he and I shall make an individual program. I submit we had better not assume that responsibility alone.

Mr. BORAH. I have been here for 17 years—

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and the country has been blessed by reason of the Senator's presence.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator. I have never seen a legislative program since I have been here. I have never known of one.

Mr. ROBINSON. I doubt if the Senator from Idaho would recognize one if he saw it.

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Idaho is so independent, so creditably independent, in his views respecting legislation, that he does not know what constitutes a legislative program.

Mr. BORAH. That may be the reason, but I have never seen a legislative program since I have been here.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think I have demonstrated conclusively the assertion which I made in the beginning. I think the statement of the Senator from Kansas corroborates that declaration. There is no disposition on this side of the Chamber to defer legislation. Nothing has happened that I know of that has prevented the other side of the Chamber from considering any measure that they are ready to bring forward.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. If it will help matters along any, I am willing to concede that we have not any program on this side of the Chamber, and I am ready to vote for any program the Senator from Arkansas may bring in.

Mr. ROBINSON. It looks like we Democrats may have to get up one.

Mr. BROOKHART. With reference to the farm bill, it has been on the calendar since March 1. If Senators on the other side will bring in a better farm bill I will vote for it in a minute.

Mr. ROBINSON. When the majority admits its total incapacity to run the Government; whenever the majority in the Senate admits its inability to legislate, then perhaps the minority will assume that responsibility.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to my colleague.

Mr. CARAWAY. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the very farm bill which he mentions was discussed the other day and those in charge said they were not ready yet to bring it before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have been advised—in fact, the Senator from Kansas just said a moment ago—that some amendments are in contemplation by the committee, and for that reason the bill is not to be taken up.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is there a single piece of legislation that the Senator knows of that has been delayed by any investigation that is being conducted by the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON. No. I have just challenged every Senator to designate a single measure of importance that has not been considered by the Senate that the majority wanted to have considered. It is true that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURNUM] has a pension bill, which many of us favor and which some of us oppose, and he has been unable to get action upon that bill. But that measure, I understand, is not an administration measure. It was vetoed by the President of the United States during the last Congress.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. After the minority side has found out, and after some of us have conceded, that we have not any very good program started over here on this side of the Chamber, is it not the duty of the minority to bring forward a program if they want to claim any great credit before the country?

Mr. ROBINSON. It may be that the country will impose that responsibility upon us. I think the best thing the majority could do would be to confess its impotency and surrender control of the Government to the Democratic Party, as I believe they will have to do after the 4th of next March.

Mr. BROOKHART. But that will not get us any very speedy farm relief legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator that that is probably impossible anyway until there is a change in the White House.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me say that if the minority side is united upon a good program and will come forth with it, it will pass at this session. I know there are votes enough on this side of the aisle to pass it. Now, let us see how you are united over there.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, we are not talking about that now. We have another subject under consideration.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator from Iowa undertake to say that the only real measure of relief for the farmers of the country would stand one bit of chance on the other side of the Chamber, to wit, a radical revision of the tariff that causes the American farmer to pay three prices for everything that he has to buy?

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me suggest that the Senator and his colleagues get together on a tariff bill and we will show him what will happen.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator think he could get together any votes on the other side of the Chamber for it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; if it is a good one.

Mr. GLASS. What does the Senator call a good one? Is it one that taxes the farmer 300 per cent on everything that he has to buy?

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, no.

Mr. GLASS. That is the one we have now.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have seen no amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia at this session.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has not even suggested a revision of the tariff nor has any such suggestion been made on his side of the Chamber, and that is the responsible side. The Senator knows perfectly well that there is not a product of the farm to-day, from chickens to wheat, that is not selling at a higher price than it sold for during a quarter of a century before the last war. Everything that the farmer has to buy is so inordinately high that he has no money left with which to buy it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I pointed that out early in the session, on the 17th of January to be exact, and I called for the enactment of such legislation as would bring the farmer upon an equality with his fellow citizens.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator does not seem able to induce his own party, which is the responsible party here, to accept his views and legislate accordingly.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have admitted that, but neither am I able to get the minority party to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will conclude the few observations I intended to submit in this connection. There is no disposition nor has there been any on this side of the Chamber to prevent the consideration of important legislation. Your failure and incompetency can not be justified on that ground, and your responsibility can not be evaded behind any such mask.

The suggestions that we should stop investigating and proceed to legislate come from many sources. The primary duty of the Congress is to legislate. But I wonder if the Senator from Idaho or any other Senator on the other side of the Chamber, or on this side, will take the position that in general the investigations which have been authorized by the Senate and the procedure under the resolutions which we have passed providing for investigations have not been justified.

Mr. BORAH. I concede it very gladly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And all such resolutions have been adopted unanimously.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Then, Mr. President, what is the ground of complaint? It may be true that some Senators have made speeches that have not pleased all Members of the Senate; it may be true that some speeches have been made that have offended powerful and influential persons, but, Mr. President, when it became known here and in the country that the administration of public affairs is tainted with incompetence, with indifference to the public interest, and with corruption, then the first duty of the Congress was to make known the facts in order that adequate remedies might be applied and in order that the future might be saved the embarrassment and humiliation incident to such disgraceful transactions as have been disclosed by these investigations.

There is no disposition on this side of the Chamber unduly to prolong investigations. I wonder if there is a disposition anywhere prematurely to terminate them, to stop them before the truth becomes known, and to cover up what ought to be revealed. If that disposition exists here or elsewhere it will meet with the opposition of honest men in the Senate and of honest citizens throughout the country.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], whose words are always "like apples of gold in pictures of silver," a few moments ago spoke wisely and well. But on last Tuesday he spoke even better than he did this afternoon. On that day he looked through the field of his political telescope and swept the entire circle of the horizon without being able to discover any land of promise or haven of rest for this administration. On the contrary, the lenses of the Senator's instrument being constructed upon the principle of Addison's magic mirror, they deceived not with distorted images but revealed the truth. The distinguished statesman accordingly had the experience of seeing at once the distressed condition of much of the country and the hopeless plight of the present administration very much as they really are.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEELY. I prefer not to yield now. When I shall have finished I shall be glad to yield.

There passed before the eagle eyes of the Senator an endless procession of the ghosts of prosperity that normalcy had made; of the specters born of deflation, and an innumerable throng of American farmers made bankrupt since the 4th day of March three years ago. Under the spell of the awful fascination the spirit of prophecy came upon the honorable Member from Idaho and the mournful muse of Jeremiah inspired him to speak to his fellow Republicans and the country, in part, as follows:

We have been in session now about three months and a half. In two months and a half more we will be practically in the midst of a national campaign for the election of a President. One of the candidates will have been nominated probably and the other convention will be near at hand.

After that shall have occurred there will be little opportunity, even if we are in session, for anything in the nature of legislation. When we look back over what we have accomplished in the last three and a half months and contemplate that we have only two and a half months to complete our task, we are confronted with the proposition that this session of Congress is going to end with practically no legislation enacted. We shall do well from this time on if we give proper consideration even to the appropriation bills.

I can not imagine anything more humiliating to the Republican Party in the coming campaign, and in all probability more disastrous, than for us to spend the next two and a half months as we have the last three and a half.

Mr. President, if during the next two and a half months we should reveal as much crime and corruption in high places as we have revealed in the three months that have just passed away, and then could find some one to prosecute the criminals who have been preying upon the vitals of the Government, the next campaign would be one of honesty instead of bribery and rascality. In such circumstances the debauchers of officials and the corrupters of the voters would be crowded into the jails and penitentiaries of the country until their feet would be sticking out of the windows. That, of course, would be a very great calamity to a party that depends upon a slush fund to elect its candidates to office.

Continuing, the Senator from Idaho says:

Homes are being sold over this country because people are unable to pay their taxes.

Think of that under this "normalcy" administration!

Business men are distressed because they are unable to meet their taxes. Farms upon which people have lived for half a century, giving their time and their industry and their effort to making homes and rearing families, are now passing from them by reason of tax sales.

I hope my friend from the agricultural State of Iowa, who attempted to interrupt me a moment ago, heard that, and will also hear the following, of which Senator BORAH is the author:

Equally distressing with the tax situation is the agricultural condition in this country. It would be difficult to command language adequately to describe the condition of the agricultural interests, especially through the great 15 Northwestern States, those great agricultural States. Speaking upon this matter some months ago, I referred to the fact that in one county in a great agricultural State there were 6,000 items in a single newspaper advertising property for sale which belonged to farmers. I received many letters from over the country wanting to know if that was not an error, whether it was not 600 instead of 6,000. It was not an error; it was a correct statement of the fact, and that is only indicative of a distressed condition which prevails throughout the agricultural regions, certainly in all the Northwestern States and, in my judgment, to a marked extent in all the States.

That is the deplorable condition of the farmers of the United States, as certified by one of the greatest if not the greatest of Republican Senators.

Thousands and thousands of them in the West are not only in bankruptcy but at the door of the poorhouse or near the point of starvation, and the "best minds" have been directing the affairs of the country during the last three years.

While the distinguished Senator from Idaho has drawn a very vivid picture of the suffering of the farmers, yet unless he has recently been away from the Capital, he can not imagine the hostility prevailing against this administration generally and those who constitute it and who are now seeking nominations as their own successors.

The following story is in point: A man intoxicated by drinking bootleg whisky and "jackass brandy" was brought before a police judge for trial. His honor said, "Your conduct has been disgraceful; what have you been drinking?" The man replied, "I have been drinking 'jackass brandy,'" and as he spoke his breath set fire to his whiskers. The magistrate said, "Can you describe that liquor?" The accused answered, "I can. One drink of that liquor would make a man go into a den of roaring lions; two drinks of it would make him fight the whole German Army; three drinks of it would make him jump from the top of the Woolworth Building; and four drinks of it would make him yell, 'Hurrah for Coolidge.'" [Laughter.]

That indicates the sentiment all over the land.

But after this administration has for three years failed to pass a soldiers' adjusted compensation law; after it has failed for three years to lower the people's taxes, and after it has for three years proved itself unable to pass a single great constructive measure, why should it now attempt to throw off its lethargy and begin to serve the people? Almost everyone will probably understand why Republican politicians are now beginning to kneel at the mourners' bench and advocate instant reformation.

I wish expressly to acquit the patriotic statesman from Idaho from being in the class I have in mind, but the most of the Republican spokesmen and Republican newspapers that are now calling for legislative action are inspired by the same motive that prompted little Willie in Field's delightful poem, "Jest 'fore Christmas," to be on his good behavior. The motive for the improvement in conduct is indicated in the following lines:

* * * Old Sport he hangs around, so solemn-like an' still,
His eyes they keep a-sayin': "What's the matter, little Bill?"
The old cat sneaks down off her perch an' wonders what's become
Of them two enemies of hern that used to make things hum!
But I am so perlitte an' 'tend so earnestly to biz,
That mother says to father: "How improved our Willie is!"
But father, havin' been a boy hisself, suspicious me
When, jest 'fore Christmas, I'm as good as I kin be!

For Christmas, with its lots an' lots of candles, cakes, an' toys,
Was made, they say, for proper kids an' not for naughty boys;
So wash yer face an' bresh yer hair, an' mind yer p's and q's;
And don't bust out yer pantaloons, and don't wear out yer shoes;
Say "Yessum" to the ladies, and "Yessur" to the men,
An' when they's company, don't pass yer plate for pie again;
But, thinkin' of the things yer'd like to see upon that tree,
Jest 'fore Christmas be as good as yer kin be!

Mr. President, while the Senator from Idaho, like a true Democrat, thinks of a political victory as an opportunity for service, yet the great majority of the officeholders of his party think of it only as a means of controlling and distributing the plums and pies and cakes of political patronage and as an opportunity to grant special privileges and bestow special favors.

But the distinguished Senator's warning comes too late. One can say to this administration, in the words of the prophet, under the spell of whose inspiration the Senator has sounded his political fire alarm, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and this administration is not saved." And when, continuing in the language of the old Semitic seer, he asks, Is there no balm in Gilead; is there no physician here? We must frankly answer, there is no balm in Gilead for the reason that the present Republican law imposes a tariff of 10 per cent on balm in Gilead, which, prior to this administration, had been on the free list ever since the days when Solomon, King of Israel, bought fir and cedar trees from Hiram, King of Tyre. So, "Yes; we have no balm in Gilead to-day."

And if a physician were here he could give no relief, because the existing Republican tariff law imposed a prohibitive duty on everything in the line of medicine from bismuth to castor oil.

The condition of this administration is the same as that of the grasshopper in the fable. It may be recalled that this common pest had spent the entire summer in filling the air with his discordant music, while the ant, with commendable prudence and industry, had stored her barn with food. When winter came—and winter always comes—and the grasshopper was on the verge of starvation, he went to the ant and begged for a crust of bread. The thrifty and industrious ant inquired of the grasshopper:

"What were you doing last summer during the time of harvest?"

The grasshopper replied:

"I was singing."
To which the ant responded:

"If you spent the summer singing, you may spend the winter dancing."

That is, in substance, the answer that the voters will make to this administration when its candidates face the crucial test of reelection next November.

Those responsible for the inefficiency, the failure, and the scandal of the present régime at last know that although it is easy to abuse a Democratic administration and malign a Democratic President, it requires brains and vision and industry and integrity to govern a great people.

Many centuries ago on the occasion of a great feast the fingers of a mysterious hand appeared and wrote the doom of a king and his kingdom, because when weighed in the balances that king was found wanting. This administration has, by the rank and file of Republicans, Independents, and Democrats alike, been weighed in the balances and found wanting as no other administration has ever been found wanting before; and on the 4th day of next November not one hand but countless millions of hands of progressive and patriotic men and women of all parties will write this administration's doom upon their ballots.

On election day the voters will say to those responsible for this administration: "You have been weighed in the balances and found wanting. Your kingdom is finished; it is given to another." And that other will be the party of Thomas Jefferson, of Andrew Jackson, of William Bryan, and Woodrow Wilson. When that shall have come to pass, the people of the United States, with a feeling of security and serenity that they have not known for three long years, will once more be able to wrap the drapery of their couch about them and lie down to pleasant dreams.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I know it is dangerous to venture a guess, but I venture the guess that the Senate is not going to do anything to-day.

I have heard certain observations on the floor this morning and this afternoon to the effect that the majority was responsible for the doing of business, or should be held so. While ordinarily I would not deny that assertion, it has occurred to me that neither the majority nor the minority is in control of the business of the Senate, nor that either of them should be regarded as responsible for the conduct of business, because the simple fact is that talk is king. Some of those who have been here the shortest time talk the most.

Mr. President, we did not even finish the routine morning business this morning. I think there were only two or three petitions presented. There were three or four committee reports; no resolutions were introduced; perhaps four or five bills; and when that order of business was reached and the next order of business, resolutions coming over from a previous day were still to be taken up, the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. During that period of two hours we discussed Central America and the causes of war; we discussed the oil scandals, of course; we discussed at considerable length why we did not do any business. For a moment a bill was pending which had been taken up by unanimous consent on the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], but its provisions were scarcely mentioned.

There is now pending before the Senate a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, but it is not going to be mentioned this afternoon. I have a suspicion that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is incubating a speech, and I do not believe that he is going to discuss the pending question or the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, Mr. President, I shall have to preface my question with a brief statement, and that is—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I know this "brief statement" business.

Mr. ROBINSON. My question is, When the Senator from New York complains about other Senators not speaking to the subject, does he think that he is himself speaking to the subject before the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. If so, by what process of reasoning does the Senator reach that conclusion? And if it is improper for other Senators to discuss subjects not before the Senate why does not the Senator from New York confine himself to the question before us?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have fallen into the habit, following the example of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator must think it is a good one, or he would not pursue it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, Mr. President, I would go almost anywhere with the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Ah, the Senator has disarmed me. There is no place that I could take him where it would not be proper for him to go.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So, Mr. President, I suppose those of us who would like to have the joint resolution which is now pending before the Senate get some consideration, and have some action taken upon it, will have to stay here patiently for the rest of the afternoon and listen to the conversation.

NAVAL OIL LAND LEASES AND DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York was correct in one of his conclusions, and that was that I was going to discuss the doings of Republican officials.

Mr. President, I know that the able and clever Senator from New York, like many of his colleagues, has grown weary of the discussion of the Teapot Dome oil matter and other things connected with the oil scandal and crime. They have heard so many crooked doings discussed that have touched the leaders of their party that they have reached the point where they are very much like the negro boy down in North Carolina who decided that he would whip somebody in order to get up a reputation for being brave. He was at a ball, and one of the dusky damsels told him that he had not gone to the war, and in order to show that he would fight he had better whip somebody. He said, "Whip who?" She said, "Anybody." So he walked out of the dance hall and found a negro standing down at the foot of the steps smoking a cigar, looking off in the other direction, and he walked up to him and struck him. The other negro dropped his cigar and whirled on his assailant and a fierce and long-drawn-out fight was on. Afterwards, when the first negro was talking to one of his white friends, Buck Bryant, of North Carolina, Buck said, "Did you whip him?" The negro, weary and badly beaten and bruised, said mournfully, "I want to tell you the truth, Mars' Buck, I never got so tired of a nigger in all of my lifetime." [Laughter.]

So it is, Mr. President, with Republican Senators who are hearing the Teapot Dome scandal and the Doherty scandal frequently discussed here, involving the bribery of Republican officials, and other Republican officials guilty of wrongdoing, some using the instrumentalities of the Government to make money for themselves and their crooked friends.

I know that Senators on the other side never got as tired of a discussion in all their lifetime; but there is but one way for them to get rid of it, and that is to let us finish the investigation and stop doing like some of the Republican Senators did this morning in this oil-land investigating committee. They are not going to get rid of this thing by suppressing testimony, as was attempted this morning. I do not agree with Mr. Sinclair's lawyer from New York that the Senate is without authority, that the Senate is helpless. I do not agree that the Senate is impotent. I believe that the Senate has the right to summon citizens from any part of the United States and have them testify before a committee that is seeking to find out why Government property has been disposed of by Government officials to their friends.

I was in the committee room this morning a little while, and I heard the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] ask this question of Mr. Will Hays:

What part did Mr. Sinclair have in paying off the debt owed by the Republican National Committee?

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] objected to having him answer that question, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM], if I remember correctly, was for sustaining that objection. The able and smooth lawyer from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] objected to having Mr. Hays answer that question, and I think the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] opposed having him answer that question.

Mr. President, that incident was astounding to me—four Republicans sitting on this committee, representing the Senate, directed by the Senate to go into the facts and bring out the material facts in the case, are apparently preventing important facts from coming out. If that question is not pertinent, there is no question that can be propounded by that committee that is pertinent.

Who got the oil lands? Mr. Sinclair. Who transferred them to him? Mr. Denby and Mr. Fall. I connect them both up with it. Fall could not have transferred this property if Denby had not said: "Here it is; go ahead and let him have it." That was the effect of his part in it. Who were they?

Secretary of the Navy and Secretary of the Interior? What party do they belong to? The Republican Party. Who is this man? Mr. Sinclair. What is he doing? He is the man who is taking over this property. Is he paying money over to these people? Why certainly he is. Is he paying money to their organization to help them win the election? Certainly he is; and after they have won the election and are in control of the Government and have in hand the property that he wants, what do you find him doing?

Contributing money to help pay the debt which the Republican National Committee owed, left over from the campaign in which these men were elected and put into office, the men from whom he is expecting favors. I saw these Republican Senators sitting there blocking the way, hampering the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and those with him in bringing out this very important testimony.

Mr. President, I got this impression from it: That from now on the Republicans are going to try to prevent vital facts from coming out. I trust I am mistaken about that. I would hate to think that in this great Republic of ours, not yet 150 years old, we had reached a time under Republican rule when men showed an interest keener and a friendship stronger for their political party than for the Government that they have sworn to protect and safeguard, and in effect aiding those on the outside to corrupt those on the inside. I should hate to believe that any Senator had reached the point when for partisan purposes he would undertake to prevent the disclosure of the truth, tie the hands of the committee, and therefore stifle the investigation and prevent the facts from being known and criminals from being apprehended and punished.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] talks about delaying business here. I find that three appropriation bills have passed the House. The Senate has passed all the appropriation bills sent to it by the House. What is the justification for the complaint that we are not passing appropriation bills? These appropriation bills or supply bills originate in the House and must be acted on by the House first. Then they come over to the Senate, and we have already passed those they have sent over to us, and there are none pending on the calendar which the House has sent over, which the Senate has not considered and passed. So the claim that the Senate is delaying action on these measures falls to the ground.

Mr. President, I hope Senators will be very frank. If they oppose carrying on these important investigations, let them say so. Do not let them assume an attitude of saying, "It is all right to carry on your investigations, but we ought to get busy with these other things." I want to say to the Senator from Idaho, for whom I have high regard and esteem, that the most important thing that we can do is to drive from office unfaithful officials who are not only permitting but aiding in the deadly work of attacking and undermining the free institutions intrusted to their care and protection. What is the use of passing bills, writing new statutes upon the books when corruption and tyranny are driving their fangs into the vitals of the Nation? Mr. President, there is nothing more important to the American people than the work the Senate is having done through these investigating committees.

One of the worst signs that I have seen in this Republican administration—one of the worst things that I have discovered in it all—is the apparent unconcern and indifference of certain Republican Senators toward a determined and thorough investigation of the most shocking, scandalous disclosures ever revealed in the history of the Government. That is painful and alarming to me. I regret to see it. The idea of men selling the instrumentalities of justice; the idea of men squandering all that the Government holds in the form of oil reserves for its national defense, worth hundreds of millions of dollars! Yet certain Senators are not doing what they should do in helping to get at the truth and relieving the Government of the enemies now striking at its very vitals. Some object to making Mr. Sinclair tell whether he helped to pay off the debt owed by the Republican National Committee.

What is the purpose of asking Mr. Sinclair that question? He has benefited to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars through favors granted by Republican officials. If he has contributed money to help pay the debt of the Republican National Committee we will understand why he has contributed. Has he gotten favors from the Government? He has. What is he doing? He is returning favors to Republican officials for the favors he received. Yet I saw four Republican United States Senators try to prevent that testimony from going into the record, and if they had had their way, he would not have been permitted to testify.

Then they stand up here and undertake to deceive the country and tell us that we are wasting time. Wasting time?

Mr. President, if this crime and corruption in office is not stopped the day is not far distant when the Government will have no national forest reserves; we will have no coal lands. We have already lost the Nation's oil reserves. And now, step by step, they are encroaching upon the liberties of the people. Yet some Senators are not shocked and stirred to action as I should like to see them. I should like to see them display a determination to push the investigations until they are completed. Every Senator here ought to become a crusader in this fight. Every official of the Government ought to get busy. The President himself ought to ring the changes around this Republic, ought to sound the trumpet call to the people telling them to back him and back us, as all together we are fighting to free the Government of crooks and criminals. But we do not hear anything from him along this line; not a word, not a word.

What would "Hickory" Jackson do? What would Theodore Roosevelt or Woodrow Wilson do with all these terrible things laid bare day by day, showing the rottenness and the crime of the Republican officials? What would they do? They would at least say something in condemnation of the crookedness of public officials. I think that the head of the Government should speak out at a time like this.

Mr. President, the National Republican of March 22, 1924, the mouthpiece of the Republican administration, characterizes the investigation now going on as a "political inquisition now in progress on Capitol Hill." Are Republican officials and Senators weary because of these investigations? Then I ask them, who made it necessary for the investigations to be made? What conduct is it that engages the attention of these investigation committees now? It is the conduct of unfaithful and crooked Republican officials. If they had been honest and had been true to their trust, if they had not betrayed the people, no investigation would have been necessary, not an hour's time would have been consumed by investigating committees. Why is it that these committees are now investigating things here day after day? It is because of revealed crookedness and crime on the part of Republican officials. Should we expose it and punish it, or should the Democratic Party say, "If we go into and expose these things they will say we are doing it for political purposes, therefore we will not disclose anything—just let them be crooked and criminal, to the hurt of the country?" Then when we get in power if any Democrat becomes a crook and criminal in office we, I suppose, would expect the Republicans not to say anything about it, because if they did somebody would say they were partisans and playing politics. If that silly situation should exist, what would happen to the country in the meantime? The country would go to the bow-wows.

There is no use for Republican officials elsewhere and Republican Senators here to try to escape responsibility. The Republican Party has to take responsibility for all this crookedness and crime. It ought to take it. As I said on yesterday, it can not escape that responsibility.

Mr. President, the American people are aroused. They have been amazed and shocked at the disclosures made here. I was away from the Capital for nearly a week, and I made some speeches. The people are talking about these scandals and they are warmly commending the Senators who are fighting to get at the truth and to punish those guilty of wrongdoing. That is how the people feel about it. But here is the National Republican organ calling this important investigation a political inquisition that is being conducted at the Capitol.

That is not all, Mr. President. This editor is jumping on the boys in the press gallery for giving publicity to these matters. He says:

A significant feature of the congressional investigations conducted as curtain raisers for the Democratic radical political campaign of 1924 has been the sensational exploitation, by the American press generally, of trivial and unreliable "evidence," given by irresponsible witnesses, reflecting upon the character of men in public life.

No man in public life, Mr. President, has been reflected on by the reports these boys have made. Such men have been reflected on and their country reflected on by their own crooked conduct. That is how the reflection came about. If any shame or humiliation attaches, it is because of crooked conduct, and not because of what these boys have reported from the committee room.

"Democratic radical political campaign of 1924?" I want to say to the credit of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LAND], a member of the oil investigating committee, that he does not vote to suppress testimony. No partisan appeal has moved him. He votes to have the truth come out, and I commend him. That is what ought to be done by all the members. He is a Republican and the Senator from Montana (Mr. WALSH) is a Democrat. There should be no politics between a Democrat and a Republican when they are fighting the common enemy of our country. If they say "It is going to redound to the good of the Democratic Party if this thing is exposed and the truth is known, it will elect Democrats," the right kind of Republican ought to say "If we can not get an honest Republican into office, I am in favor of putting an honest Democrat in." That is what they ought to say. If partisan politics is played to that extent, on the firing line in France a Republican boy and a Democratic boy fighting side by side, the Republican boy might have said "If the war is won Wilson, a Democratic President, will get the credit, because the war would be won under the leadership of the Democratic Commander in Chief. Therefore I will not fight." He would be putting his party interest above the welfare of his country. Such a situation would be utterly ridiculous, Mr. President. The American people will have no patience with such a spirit here or elsewhere. Democrats and Republicans alike ought to go into that committee room with fixedness of purpose to do one thing, to get at the truth, and let the exposure fall wherever it will, and let the truth come out and the country know who is guilty of misusing and abusing power intrusted to them.

When Sinclair was wanted, when it was found out that some ugly disclosures were about to come forth, he sailed for Europe and was gone for weeks.

"Mr. Archie Roosevelt, what is he doing over there?"

"I don't know. He has no business over there."

But he went away. He is a big man. He has millions of dollars in his purse, given him by crooked Republican officials by bartering property intrusted to their care—property that belonged to the people of the United States.

No wonder he can and does contribute large sums to the campaign fund of the Republican Party. Where was he then? Gone to Europe. Where is he now? Why, he is back. Will he testify? "Pardon me; will you testify, Mr. Sinclair?" "No; I do not think I will." The ordinary citizen, the rank-and-file fellow, is just yanked around, and they say to him, "Sit down here and tell the truth," and they scare him half to death. But Mr. Sinclair can employ Martin Littleton, a fine fellow personally and one of the ablest lawyers in the United States. He is a very brilliant man. He can employ the best lawyers in the land, because he has the money to do it. Where did he get it? He got it out of the Government's treasure house, turned over to him by crooked Republican officials. Oh, yes; he can employ great lawyers to undertake to lead and lose the investigating committee in a maze of technicalities, and hide behind precedents, many of which are nothing more nor less than errors grown old.

Mr. Littleton, Mr. Sinclair's great lawyer, took the position that the committee had no right to summon witnesses and take testimony in an investigation of this kind. I want the Senate to pass on that question. I want to see how many Senators will vote on a roll call to sustain that objection. A vote like that would be nothing more nor less than saying that this investigation has got to stop; that too much has come out already. It would mean "the election is approaching; damaging testimony is coming out every day; it must stop." Then what? Are we going to say to the men involved, "You are free now; go"? Then what do we say to other officials in the Government if they are inclined to do something crooked? It will enable them to say, "Thank God, we are out of the reach of the Senate. They can not investigate us now. They have settled that question. We can go into court, and if we can fix the court like certain crooks and Government agents did in the fight-film pictures we can buy immunity from prosecution."

Then what is the situation with the Government itself? The legislative body has been paralyzed by the shrewd argument of learned lawyers employed by these old-made millionaires, made millionaires by pillaging and plundering the oil property of the people. Then you go into court, and if the court can be manipulated as the witnesses swear they did manipulate them, what is the remedy? Mob law. That is what you are encouraging. The legislative branch of the Government is paralyzed, shorn of its power. The court instrumentalities are tied up and you can not get action there. Then what? You have chaos, riot, and you contribute to the mob spirit amongst the masses and then stand up and abuse people for being Bolsheviks. Mr. President, when I look this country over and see the Bolsheviks that have sprung up, the socialists and anarchists that have sprung up under the reign of the Republican Party,

I think that those who condemn them for being what they are ought to acknowledge the truth and say, "We have administered the instrumentalities of government and so shown favors to some and worked hardships on others that we have produced you. You are simply the fruits of our administration." That is what they are. Then they abuse them. Then here is this partisan sheet, this Republican administration mouthpiece, referring to the Democratic radical campaign movement for 1924. If there are radicals in the country, whose administration produced them?

Mr. President, they condemn Roxie Stinson for her testimony. They say that she offered to sell to the Attorney General all she knew and all the documentary evidence against him and his friends for $150,000, and they seek in that way to discredit this poor woman who was separated from her husband, Jess Smith, who was such a warm friend of Mr. Daugherty, and who finally killed himself or was killed in Mr. Daugherty's apartment after having willed to Mr. Daugherty about $25,000, I believe. It is said that she offered to sell her testimony and therefore she is a discredited witness. I come back to the proposition, the like of which I announced a little while ago. Why did she offer to sell? Because she had something to sell. Who was responsible for her having something to sell? The conduct of Daugherty and his intimate friends. If they had not been guilty of the things that she had set out, why would she have had anything of value to them, and why did she go to them wanting to dispose of something unless it was of interest and of value to them?

Mr. President, that is the story in a nutshell. This girl knew something. She wanted to sell it to them, they said, for $150,000. I submit that she must have thought that what she knew was pretty valuable to Mr. Daugherty and his friends if she demanded $150,000 for it. Daugherty and his friends undertake to discredit her now.

Another important witness has gone—Mr. Howard Mannington. When the people of this country learn just what is going on here to prevent a real investigation they will be astounded. Here is what occurred in the committee room. I read from the hearings:

Senator ASHURST. Mr. Chairman, the observation you made a while ago that this committee was being spied upon and its witnesses intimidated by the entire Secret Service of this Government is quite true.

Think of that! The Secret Service of the Government not backing and aiding the men who are trying to get at the truth in behalf of the Government, to help preserve its institutions, but being used to spy upon the members of the committee, to hamper them in their investigations.

Continuing, he said:

Now, in all the courts of this land the party that suppresses evidence can not complain if the suppressed evidence or the intimidated witness may be presumed to have testified against them. That is the rule of law everywhere. Now, this committee needs the testimony of Howard Mannington—

Senator WHITTIER. Yes.

Senator ASHURST. If the Secretary of State of the United States is a faithful officer of this Government, if the Attorney General is not attempting to conceal something, they will return Howard Mannington from Europe to the United States forthwith. I have reason to believe, and upon such reason charge it to be a fact, that collusion exists on the part of the Attorney General toward spiriting away Howard Mannington so that he could not be present, but would be and is now, beyond the reach of the process of this committee. That impression that exists in my mind as to this conspiracy can only be removed by their prompt production of Howard Mannington.

Senator JONES of Washington. Well, Senator, what connection has the Secretary of State with the matter?

Senator ASHURST. He probably issued the passport, and he has the power to ask his return.

Senator JONES of Washington. Should we not request the State Department to do that?

Senator ASHURST. I am doing that. I ask the Secretary of State—

Senator JONES of Washington. Well, should not we do it in a formal request by the committee?

Senator ASHURST. Yes; I am asking that it be done in a formal way. I am asking now—

Senator JONES of Washington. But let us have the letter signed by the chairman.

Senator ASHURST. I want it signed. I hereby formally demand that the Hon. Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State of the United States, furnish to the committee the original application of Mr. Mannington for his passport; and I further ask and demand that he cause Mr.

Mannington to be returned to the United States at the earliest date. I ask that the clerk of the committee may do that.

Senator WHEELER. Let me interrupt you a minute. I understand from the newspaper accounts that Mr. Mannington is now on the Dawes Commission in Paris.

On the Dawes Commission in Paris representing the Government. Think of that, Senators.

Senator ASHURST. I want to say that when the Teapot Dome investigation began it was found that important witnesses had been sent to the uttermost parts of the earth. I will not sit here silently and permit one of the most important witnesses to be sent away. Those who sent this witness away will have to get him back, or I have a right to presume bad faith.

No wonder certain Republican Senators are getting weary of this discussion.

Mr. HOWLAND (attorney for Mr. Daugherty). On behalf of the Attorney General I deny every implication contained in the Senator's remarks of wrongdoing.

Senator ASHURST. Will you produce Howard Mannington?

Mr. HOWLAND. I have no control over Howard Mannington.

Senator ASHURST. Your client can order his return.

Mr. HOWLAND. Don't worry. Don't be so anxious. Howard Mannington will be here if we want him.

If "we" want him. Do you get that, Senators?

Senator ASHURST. If you want him? Why, of course.

Mr. HOWLAND. And if you want him, subpoena him.

I am reading from the hearings before the committee. This is the stenographic report of the hearings taken by the committee.

These facts disclose an awful situation, Mr. President. I read this for the purpose of letting the country know what unfriendly conditions we are laboring under as we seek to get at the truth in the interest of honesty in government at Washington. Here Senator ASHURST sits, an able Senator who has served for more than 12 years in this body, and says they are guilty of bad faith, and he has a right to believe they are sending witnesses out of the country in order to keep the truth from being had. It is disclosed that this fellow is over there on some commission representing the Government.

Jess Smith, at the instance of Mr. Daugherty, was in the Government service. Jess Smith was the right-hand man of Mr. Daugherty, we are told. Jess Smith, I understand, was a dry-goods clerk out in Ohio and never had any experience in any of the work he was called on to do here.

I asked the other day and I ask again, and I want members of the committee to ask Mr. Daugherty or his friends, why he brought Jess Smith to Washington? Separated from his wife, but it was said afterwards they continued to be friends and that she knew all about what Jess Smith was doing. He gave her a lot of the money he took in. She testified about seeing him, I believe, with large sums of money and what he told her he was doing with it. Does anybody doubt that he told her the truth? He knew what was going on. Finally some say that he killed himself and some say that he was killed. I do not know. He died under very suspicious circumstances. He knew a great many things; he was a very important witness, but he is gone.

Here we are with Mr. ASHURST, a Senator of the United States, saying that the Secret Service of the Government is not giving any aid, but that the Senators themselves who are making this investigation are being spied upon and every handicap possible that the Secret Service instrumentalities can control are thrown in their way and used to hinder and hamper them.

Mr. President, why will not the President act? Why will he not ask Mr. Daugherty to resign? I have been told—I have said this before and I want to repeat it—that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], speaking for the President, suggested to Mr. Daugherty that he ought to resign; that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] was with him; that they both suggested that Mr. Daugherty ought to resign; but he has not resigned.

What ought the President do in view of all these disclosures? This is not Roxie Stinson testifying, but it is a United States Senator, who has been honored by this body by electing him on this committee to investigate these grave charges and to get at the truth. He says on his responsibility that the Secret Service of this Government is hampering the committee, is spying on the committee, and is doing what it can to hinder it; and yet the President will not act. Mr. President, I have a right to ask the President to act.

The whole country has the right to ask him to act. The people want him to act.

I stated on yesterday, and I am going to state again, that the President has no right to permit the Attorney General to be in charge of the testimony that is to be brought out in his own case; he has no right to keep him at the head of the Department of Justice, where many of the agents under him would like to testify, but they are not free; they are embarrassed and hampered and may be intimidated by the situation as we find it in the Department of Justice. Then Senators get up here and complain that we do not let them take up some proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States. There is not anything that pleases some Senators so much as getting away from this proposition and discussing some intricate constitutional measure. If ever they can strike that, they are properly on the trail, for some of them would like to get away from what is going on here now. Nothing now being considered by Congress is so important and imperative as that every man here should bare his arm for battle and keep on battling until the whole truth is known regarding the bribery of public officials and the betrayal of public trust by Federal officials.

Mr. President, I remember in 1920 when investigating committees were sitting every day and I could hardly come into this Chamber from the other House that I did not hear Republicans assailing the Democratic administration and talking about the mistakes of Democratic officials. That was all right; I am not complaining. If the Democratic administration did wrong, that wrong ought to be pointed out not only for the good it would do the Government but in order to call the party leaders' attention to its wrongdoing and so that they might profit by those mistakes and avoid such mistakes in the future. I like legitimate criticism; it is right and proper to have it. We did not whine and say that you were neglecting public business—certainly, I did not—but now, when we are talking about corruption and crime in nearly every department of the Government, you run to cover and try to prevent the investigations.

Already one Cabinet officer has gone out branded all over with bribery, fraud, and corruption; another one has been retired from the Navy Department after the President had been asked by the Senate to put him out; and the Attorney General, the head of the Department of Justice, is under fire; scandals are suggested in connection with the immigration law, it being stated that thousands of immigrants are coming in and no account being kept of them, that they are flooding the country because of the action of corrupt agents who permit it to be done; the Secretary of the Commerce Department, Mr. Undermyer says, is setting at naught the antitrust laws, and he is now accused by a whole section of the country of having permitted reports of cotton in existence in the United States to be padded and 600,000 bales to be added to the amount reported as having been produced and imported, all this to the hurt and injury of the cotton producers of the United States.

Mr. President, it seems that there is something wrong in nearly every department of the Government. If that be true, we ought to clean up. We have no right to permit crooked men to remain in these high and important places. We have no right to let injury be done the people of the country and the Government itself because we may be indifferent and do not want to do our duty here. We owe it to ourselves and we owe it to the country to perform our duty faithfully.

I know the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has stated that if we have three more months like the past three the Republican Party had just as well shut up shop. That is the substance of his statement. I know it is a gloomy situation, but men and women throughout the history of the world have had to fight in order to preserve their institutions. Free institutions never are preserved by any namby-pamby tactics; they can not preserve themselves. Eternal vigilance on the part of human beings is the price of human liberty. I know the past three months have been very demoralizing and deplorable for some people. While the Senator from Idaho was speaking I thought of this little verse:

O, I have passed a miserable night,
So full of ugly sights, of ghastly dreams,
I would not spend another such night.

I know it is bad, Mr. President, but we have got to go through with this job. When a boy is brought into the hospital and the doctor makes a diagnosis of his case and says, "We have got to make an incision in his side; we have got to remove his appendix; it has burst; it has got to come out or poison will get him"; and the boy who is to be operated on says, "No; do not do that; it will be painful"; they do not let him have his way because it is painful and because he would like to be let alone. They operate on him; they take out his appendix, and thereby save his life. The boy gets well, and then he thanks the doctors for having operated on him and having saved his life and not having yielded to his pitiful pleas not to operate on him because it would be painful. Yes, I know the present situation is painful for the Republican Party, Mr. President, but the operation has got to be performed, for there is a cancer eating on the very vitals of the Federal Government. Instead of each Senator gathering around and asking, "Is there anything I can do? I want to aid in it; I want to give service to my country"; we find some of them standing back and saying, "Let the operation alone. No; you can not perform the operation." And they are doing everything they can to prevent a much-needed—a very necessary—operation.

In conclusion, I wish to say that the Senator from Idaho speaks of enacting certain legislation. Mr. President, of what value will legislation be when the main instrumentalities of the Federal Government have been taken from the hands of the friends of the people and turned over to their enemies? Already we have found that the mighty rich have had their taxes refunded in one year to the amount of over $100,000,000; that this favoritism has been shown by one of the three richest men in all the world, Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, and it is suggested that some taxes of his own have been refunded.

No wonder the beneficiaries of that favoritism indorse the Mellon plan, having had $123,000,000 handed back to them, while other taxpayers are having a hard time getting individual loans for $500 passed on by the War Finance Corporation in order to save their homes from sale, and still others are hard pressed because their homes are being sold for taxes. There is favoritism, class legislation, centralization of power in the Government at Washington, and concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, and a few are made rich at the expense of the many. That is what we have under Republican rule; and yet Senators on the other side tell us that we ought to let them pass certain supply bills.

I ask again, what will it amount to to pass a few measures here at this session of Congress if we permit the corrupt condition to continue—conditions that have existed since 1921 and which have been getting worse each year until to-day they have become a national scandal and crime, so bad that a United States Senator under his oath states that the Secret Service of the Department of Justice is used to spy on and hamper a Senate committee which is investigating a great crime against the Government of the United States?

There is nothing more important, nothing of greater national concern in all the confines of the country than the grave matters that now engage our attention. As the Senator from Idaho was speaking about getting ordinary legislation passed I thought of what Thomas Moore had said in his poem on "Corruption." I will close my speech with a quotation from it.

Senators, I repeat, this Government is sick; it needs quick and decisive treatment. Those who feed and fatten on Republican favor at Government expense and make their millions out of the national resources sold to them by Republican officials who have betrayed their trust are now proclaiming that the country is prosperous. It is not so. The instrumentalities of Government are being used to favor the money lords of the land, while they impose burdens grievous to be borne on the masses of the people. Our fathers fought to achieve our independence; it is our duty to fight to preserve it.

If Washington and Jefferson could come back to life they would be shocked and grieved to see the processes of destruction that are at work in the very strongholds of the Nation. The Government is being stripped of the things that make it the free, upstanding, clean, and helpful instrumentality of what a government of the people, by the people, and for the people should be. Under Republican rule it has become the handy instrument of the enemies of constitutional government. Unless we free it from the things that now seek to drag it down and destroy it this quotation from Thomas Moore will indeed be appropriate:

The people!—Ah! that freedom's form should stay
Where freedom's spirit long hath passed away!
That a false smile should play around the dead
And flush the features when the soul hath fled.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the Chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] to the amendment reported by the committee.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I was greatly interested in a discussion of the business that is being now prepared in committees and which we have assurances will soon come before the Senate. I agree with Senators in the necessity for tax reduction, for, in my opinion, that is the commanding and imperative business of this Congress. The country is now suffering under a greater burden of taxation than ever before in its history. The demand for relief comes from all sections of the country, from all classes of people. I hope the revenue bill will soon be reported and passed and this country given substantial and speedy relief.

I am also in favor of some substantial relief for the agricultural interests. I think that is the next most important business of the session, and it is gratifying to hear that a proper measure will soon be reported.

There are, however, other matters which must be disposed of during the present Congress. The immigration bill is one of the most important matters under consideration. A bill, known as the Johnson bill, has been reported in the House and is on the calendar there. I do not know when it will be considered, but I hope soon. That bill, soon after it was reported, was taken up by the Immigration Committee of the Senate and hearings were had upon it and a substitute offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. It has been thoroughly considered and is practically ready for action. There has been no delay by the Immigration Committee of the Senate. There is a demand and a necessity that we have a permanent immigration policy, and that that policy be written into law. The immigration that would have flooded this country had it not been for our quota law would have been a great menace to Americans and American institutions. The safety of our people and our institutions demands that there be a rigid limitation of immigration, both in quality and in quantity. I hope that a proper bill will be enacted at this session.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator says that the committee has practically closed its hearings and consideration of the bill. Can the Senator inform us what the difference will be between the Johnson bill and the Reed bill, or whether the Senate committee proposes to report a substitute, or what action the Senate committee is about to take?

Mr. SHIELDS. The bill that probably will be reported by the Immigration Committee is the substitute of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. Largely it is the Johnson bill, but important modifications of it have been proposed and practically agreed upon by the Senate Committee on Immigration; but that is a subject too large for me to go into at this hour and on this occasion. I wish to discuss it fully some other day.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. DIAL. Are the hearings completed?

Mr. SHIELDS. The hearings are closed.

Mr. DIAL. They are just waiting on the report?

Mr. SHIELDS. And to some extent they are waiting on the action of the House.

Mr. President, there is another measure which should be considered and finally disposed of speedily. I refer to the lease of the potential water power that will be developed by the Government navigation dams in the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals in Alabama.

Propositions have been made by a number of parties and corporations to lease this water power, several of which have been pending for years. The House of Representatives has accepted the proposition submitted by Henry Ford and has passed a bill for that purpose, which, coming to the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, where it is now pending. There are other propositions for the lease of this power also before that committee.

I have discussed the necessity of prompt action with the chairman and several members of the committee, calling their attention to the necessity of Congress making a lease of this great power at this session, and I am assured by them that there will be no delay, and that, consistent with other duties in regard to other bills which they have under consideration, final action will be taken and report made to the Senate. I hope and believe there will be no unreasonable delay and that the report may be made at an early date.

Mr. President, the development of the great potential water power at Muscle Shoals challenged my interest soon after I came to the Senate, but as special bills concerning the development of the water power of our navigable rivers had repeatedly failed, I introduced a general bill under which the development could be made at Muscle Shoals. When I presented this bill to the Senate, while calling attention to the fact that it was a general bill, I frankly stated my object was to make possible the development and utilization of the great water power at Muscle Shoals, primarily for the manufacture of air nitrogen to be used in explosives in time of war and in fertilizers in time of peace. The bill passed the Senate at two different sessions, but upon each occasion was defeated in the House. It was again introduced in a modified form and became a law.

When the war came on and the necessity for the manufacture of air nitrogen in this country for explosives and fertilizers was emphasized as never before, the Government began the construction of the Wilson Dam, and constructed two plants, known as plant No. 1 and plant No. 2, for the manufacture of nitrogen. These plants were operated during the war to some extent by steam power, but as this could not be successfully done for commercial purposes, when the war was over they were shut down. The Government continued after a lapse of some time the construction of the Wilson Dam, and I am informed that it will be completed during the next year. There will be developed there about 600,000 horsepower of water power, which can be used for the operation of these plants, as well as to furnish cheap power to the surrounding country.

There should be no Government operation of the hydro-electric power to be developed, but it should be leased to some responsible persons or corporations under proper regulations in the public interest, and primarily devoted to the manufacture of air nitrogen for the manufacture of cheap fertilizers in aid of the agriculture interests of the country. There, of course, should be proper safeguards against this great property of the people falling under the control of any trust or monopoly, and I believe that any legislation that is passed will have strong provisions for this purpose.

The proposition of Henry Ford has met with the favor of the House of Representatives, as expressed by a very large majority, and presumably is the most favorable to the interest of the people. What modifications may be made of the McKenzie bill by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, when it is reported to the Senate, can not be anticipated, but we must await the report.

I have never committed myself to any of the propositions for the lease and operation of this great property, but have kept myself in a position to urge a contract which will best protect the interests of the people. I want the contract providing for the manufacture of cheap fertilizer, and I would be glad to see a portion of the surplus power available to the towns and cities of my State for manufacturing purposes. I understand Mr. Ford is willing to make provisions of this kind.

This property is worth over a billion dollars, and the improvements have cost the Government over $125,000,000. Any lease made of it must be for a long term of years, and the disposition of it should be considered carefully, thoughtfully, and in a businesslike manner.

Mr. President, I can not urge too strongly upon the Senate prompt legislation for the leasing of this power. It would be a calamity to the whole country, and especially to the Southern States, for it to be delayed longer than this session. It is one of the most important measures before the Congress. The dams will be completed and the power developed next year, and the lessee, whoever he may be, should have time to put the nitrogen plants in condition and make other arrangements to proceed to the manufacture of fertilizer and the utilization of the power promptly. The farmers of the South, where fertilizers are absolutely necessary for successful cultivation of crops, have too long been compelled to pay unreasonable prices for fertilizer, and in their depressed condition they should have relief at the earliest date it can be given. I therefore urge, Mr. President, that this matter have the attention of the Senate without fail before the Congress shall adjourn.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand that an executive session is desired. Before that motion is made, however, in order to place myself right with reference to an interruption this morning in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I desire to say that in what I said I had reference to what the newspapers had reported regarding the conference held yesterday—not to what took place at the conference, not to what was said to the President or said by the President, but the statement made by the chairman of the Finance Committee as reported in the press. Naturally I deplored the attitude that we might not expect any action on this important subject of tax reduction before the recess; and simply to confirm what I stated, I will say that I have before me the New York Times of March 22, in which this statement appears in the headlines:

SMOOT, in talk at White House, says tax bill can't pass before recess.

Also, the New York Journal of Commerce, which says in a headline:

Finance chairman declares action will not be taken before June conventions.

It was the appearance of those items in these papers that prompted me to suggest that we ought at least to try to get action upon that important bill intended to reduce the taxes of the people promptly and without such delay as seems to be contemplated.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As it is the purpose of the Senator from Kansas to move an executive session, I ask that the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection such will be the order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have no objection to going into executive session, but I will say to the Senator from Kansas and the Senate that I should like to have the Senate rise after the executive session and renew the legislative session. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, has a brief report which he desires to submit, and which I should like to get in this afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. I will withhold the motion now for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The report is in process of preparation. I suggest to the Senator that we have the executive session and then come back briefly into legislative session.

Mr. CURTIS. It is not intended to transact any legislative business this afternoon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. None except to receive the report. I may say, Mr. President, in explanation, that during the morning session of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys Mr. Sinclair was called to the stand, and refused to be interrogated by the committee, and declined to answer the questions which were submitted to him. It is the purpose of the chairman of the committee, as I understand, to make a formal report on the proceedings to the Senate this afternoon.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I move, Mr. President, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. After the executive session we can return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

NAVAL OIL-LAND LEASES—HARRY F. SINCLAIR.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, I desire at this time to submit to the Senate the report of to-day's proceedings before that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota desire to have the report read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the report be read. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is the Senator from North Dakota going to ask the Senate to take any action at the conclusion of the reading of the report?

Mr. LADD. I think that is up to the Senate. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was simply going to suggest that very few Senators are on the floor, and if the Senator intended to ask for any action I think a quorum should be present.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think it is the purpose to ask the Senate to take any action on the matter to-day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether the plan is to have the report read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have asked that it be read. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The reading clerk read the report (No. 299), as follows:

BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, PROCEEDING UNDER SENATE RESOLUTION NO. 147.

Harry F. Sinclair, called to the stand as a witness before the committee, made the following statement:

"I do not decline to answer any question upon the ground that my answers may tend to incriminate me, because there is nothing in any of the facts or circumstances of the lease of Teapot Dome which does or can incriminate me.

"In January of last year I was called before the Manufactures Committee of the Senate and produced all books and papers called for and testified fully regarding the lease of Teapot Dome and the organization of Mammoth Oil Co., which holds that lease. On October 28 last past I came before your committee and answered all questions put to me by your committee in respect to the lease of Teapot Dome and the organization of Mammoth Oil Co., and was excused. In the afternoon of the same day I was recalled and answered all questions put to me by your committee, and was again excused. On December 4 last past I was called again before your committee and answered all questions put to me and had my auditor present, who also testified. I was requested to furnish the committee with certain papers and memoranda, which was promptly done. On December 27 last past I was again called before your committee and answered all questions put to me and produced all books and papers asked for by the committee. I was then excused until the 4th of January, on which date I again appeared and answered all questions put to me by the committee and produced all books and papers asked for, and I was finally excused from further attendance.

"Thus it appears that I have been before your committee at five different sessions and answered all questions and produced all books and papers called for, and I was finally excused from further attendance. I went abroad on business which had been delayed owing to the necessity of my attendance on your hearings, as I had a perfect right to do, without secrecy and without evasion.

"When I appeared before your committee at these dates and answered your questions and produced all books and papers asked for, your committee was acting under Senate Resolution 282 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, which authorized you—

"To investigate the entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources."

"Since the date of my last appearance before your committee, and at the instance of your committee, the Senate and House passed Senate Joint Resolution No. 54, which has been signed by the President. I make that resolution a part of this statement:

"Whereas it appears from evidence taken by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the United States Senate that certain lease of naval reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming, bearing date April 7, 1922, made in form by the Government of the United States, through Albert B. Fall, Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, as lessor, to the Mammoth Oil Co., as lessee, and that certain contract between the Government of the United States and the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., dated April 25, 1922, signed by Edward C. Finney, Acting Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, relating, among other things, to the construction of oil tanks at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and that certain lease of naval reserve No. 1, in the State of California, bearing date December 11, 1922, made in form by the Government of the United States, through Albert B. Fall, Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, as lessor, to the Pan American Petroleum Co., as lessee, were executed under circumstances indicating fraud and corruption; and

"Whereas the said leases and contract were entered into without authority on the part of the officers purporting to act in the execution of the same for the United States and in violation of the laws of Congress; and

"Whereas such leases and contract were made in defiance of the settled policy of the Government, adhered to through three successive administrations, to maintain in the ground a great reserve supply of oil adequate to the needs of the Navy in any emergency threatening the national security:

"Resolved, etc., That the said leases and contract are against the public interest, and that the lands embraced therein should be recovered and held for the purpose to which they were dedicated; and

"Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed immediately to cause suit to be instituted and prosecuted for the annulment and cancellation of the said leases and contract and all contracts incidental or supplemental thereto; to enjoin the further extraction of oil from the said reserves under said leases or from the territory covered by the same; to secure any further appropriate incidental relief; and to prosecute such other actions or proceedings, civil and criminal, as may be warranted by the facts in relation to the making of the said leases and contract.

"And the President is further authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, special counsel who shall have charge and control of the prosecution of such litigation, anything in the statutes touching the powers of the Attorney General of the Department of Justice to the contrary notwithstanding."

"This resolution, in effect, denounces the lease between the Government and the Mammoth Oil Co., of which I am president, as void, because of fraud and corruption and for want of lawful authority on the part of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior to execute it. This is an assertion that under the 'rights and equities' of the United States the land covered by the lease of Teapot Dome belongs to the United States. The resolution further asserts that the lease was made 'in defiance of the settled policy of the Government, adhered to through three successive administrations, to maintain in the ground a great reserve supply of oil adequate to the needs of the Navy in any emergency threatening the national security.' This is a definite outline of the policy of the Government with respect to the 'preservation of its natural resources.' The resolution further declares said lease is 'against the public interest, and the lands embraced therein should be recovered and held for the purpose to which they were dedicated.' This is a further definite declaration of the policy of the Government for the 'preservation of its natural resources.' It further provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed immediately to cause suit to be instituted and prosecuted for the annulment and cancellation of the said leases and contract and all contracts incidental or supplemental thereto; to enjoin the further extraction of oil from the said reserves under said leases or from the territory covered by the same; to secure any further appropriate incidental relief; and to prosecute such other actions or proceedings, civil and criminal, as may be warranted by the facts in relation to the making of said leases and contract."

"The President was further authorized to employ special counsel to prosecute such litigation, and in a further resolution instituted in the House $100,000 was appropriated to cover the expenses incurred in such litigation.

"Thereafter the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did appoint counsel, who were duly sworn and took their office as special counsel to the Government authorized by said Senate Joint Resolution No. 54; and the said counsel, by bill of complaint in the District Court of the United States for the District of Wyoming, sued the Mammoth Oil Co., the holder of the lease, the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., and the Sinclair Pipeline Co., and applied for relief by temporary injunction and receivers, which was granted. In said bill of complaint it is charged, in paragraph 28:

"In negotiating and concluding said agreement, said Albert B. Fall and said Harry F. Sinclair, acting for and on behalf of the defendant Mammoth Oil Co., did fraudulently and covinously combine, confederate, and conspire, in the manner and in the acts hereinabove set forth and other matters and things, to defraud the United States of America—

"(a) By granting said lease upon said naval petroleum lands in violation of law;

"(b) To favor and prefer said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. over and above other persons desirous of taking lease upon said lands;

"(c) To insure to said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. the valuable right to receive and take to exhaustion all of the oil and gas which might be obtained from said lands in said agreement mentioned; and

"(d) To lease the said lands to said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. by said agreement at an inadequate, improper, and fraudulent consideration."

"And thereafter the said special counsel, acting for the Government, made an official announcement that application had been made for the organization of a special grand jury in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of inquiring into offenses and crimes growing out of the circumstances attending the execution of this lease.

"It is perfectly clear, therefore, from the language of the resolution that your committee by reason of any constitutional power which it may possess or by virtue of the resolution under which it is acting is not now engaged, nor could it be engaged, in an investigation with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources"; because the Senate, from whom you derive your authority, has unanimously passed upon all questions embraced within that authorization and exhausted whatever power or authority it had in the premises. It is further perfectly clear that the Congress and the President have made of the whole matter a judicial question, determinable solely by the courts of the country, and such question is now actually pending in the district court of the United States for the district of Wyoming, and whatever criminal act is claimed is about to be investigated by a special grand jury of the District of Columbia. With due respect to your committee, I claim that you are without any jurisdiction to question me further regarding the procurement of the lease or the validity thereof or any fact or circumstance pertaining thereto; that such an examination of me by your committee would not only be clearly outside of your jurisdiction but would be, in effect, an examination before trial in a civil action between the Government and the company I represent, by a body of men wholly unauthorized by law and in a wholly unauthorized manner. Or, if your examination should be directed toward eliciting facts concerning fraud or corruption, your committee in effect would have constituted itself a grand jury as to a matter which Congress and the President, by Joint Resolution 54, have directed should be presented to the constitutional authorities of the country.

"I am the president of the Mammoth Oil Co. and, as such, represent all others interested in that company. I negotiated the lease of Teapot Dome and am responsible for those negotiations. Any pertinent question which your committee could ask would necessarily relate to the procurement of that lease and its validity. You and the body from which you derive your authority have already sat in judgment on these questions and remitted them to courts of proper jurisdiction. I shall reserve any evidence I may be able to give for those courts, to which you and your colleagues have deliberately referred all questions of which you had any jurisdiction, and shall respectfully decline to answer any questions propounded by your committee."

Thereupon the following proceedings were had:

"Senator WALSH, Mr. Sinclair, I desire to interrogate you about a matter concerning which the committee had no knowledge or reliable information at any time when you had heretofore appeared before the committee and with respect to which you must then have had knowledge. I refer to the testimony given by Mr. Bonfils concerning a contract that you made with him touching the Teapot Dome. I wish you would tell us about that.

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Since you were last upon the stand we had, Mr. Sinclair, before us a copy of a contract entered into between the Mammoth Oil Co., under which or as a consequence of which the Pioneer Oil Co. ceased to be a competitor of yours in this lease of the Teapot Dome. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. When your private confidential secretary, Mr. Wahlberg, was before the committee he told us about the loan of some stock of the Sinclair Consolidated Co. to one Hays. Will you tell us about that transaction?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer by advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Since you were on the stand last Mr. John C. Shaffer told us about an agreement between yourself and Secretary Fall, under which Mr. Shaffer was to receive from you a certain portion of the territory covered by the lease which you secured for the Mammoth Oil Co. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on the advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Mr. Sinclair, will you tell the committee where and when you met Secretary Fall during the months of November and December last?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on the advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. On the 3d day of February, 1923, Mr. Sinclair, as my information is, you caused to be transmitted to the National Metropolitan Bank, of this city, from the National Park Bank, of New York, the sum of $100,000, payable to your order, which, on the 7th day of February, 1923, you transmitted to the Chase National Bank upon your direction. Will you tell us about that transaction?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel I decline to answer on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Information has come to the committee to the effect that you contributed 75,000 shares of the stock of the Sinclair Consolidated Co. to Mr. Hays, or to some one representing the National Republican Committee, for the purpose of making up the deficit in the account of that committee. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel I decline to answer, on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. The committee is still desirous, Mr. Sinclair, of examining the books of the Hyva Corporation. Are you prepared to produce those books?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel I decline to bring the books before this committee, upon the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer to prove by the witness, if he would answer, that, among other things—

"Senator SPENCER (Interposing). Do I understand, Senator WALSH, that what you propose to put into the record is what you think the witness would testify if he did not claim exemption?

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Yes, sir. I propose to prove certain facts by this witness.

"Mr. LITTLETON. If I have any rights at all here—I am counsel for the witness—I certainly object to your putting into this record what you imagine the witness would have answered when he has claimed his rights here under the law.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. All right, Mr. Littleton.

"Mr. LITTLETON. I protest most earnestly against it as an outrage.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. I protest, Mr. Chairman, against any such remarks from counsel as an abuse of his privilege. Counsel yesterday, here by the courtesy of this committee, said that certain things that this committee propose to do were monstrous, and now we are told this morning that what I offered to do, with the privilege of the committee, is an outrage. That is an abuse of the privilege of counsel, and I desire the chairman to admonish counsel to that effect.

"The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the chairman that counsel went beyond his rights, both yesterday and to-day, in his statements.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Now, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the witness, through his counsel, has objected and protested against the proposal which I make to set out what I expect to prove by the witness, I do not press my purpose to state the facts to the committee. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

"The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

"Senator DILL. I wanted to ask Mr. Sinclair whether he was willing to answer any questions about the services that Mr. Archie Roosevelt performed for his organization in reference to testimony given here since he was last before us.

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, by advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"Senator ADAMS. Mr. Sinclair, I believe in an earlier hearing you testified, in answer to a question, that you had in no way, and none of your companies had in any way, given or loaned anything to Secretary Fall. Is that correct?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, on advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions on the part of any member of the committee? Senator ADAMS, have you any further questions?

"(No response.)

"Mr. Sinclair, you are excused.

"Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to put on the record the subpoena duces tecum which was served upon Mr. Sinclair, and ask that it be made a part of the record.

"The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection.

"(The subpoena duces tecum above referred to is as follows:)

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"To HARRY F. SINCLAIR.

"Sinclair Consolidated Oil Co., New York City, greeting:

"Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate of the United States on Friday, March 21, 1924, at 10 o'clock a. m., at their committee room in the Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject matters under consideration by said committee, and bring with you all the books and records of the Hyva Corporation.

"Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

"To David S. Barry, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States, to serve and return.

"Given under my hand, by order of the committee, this 19th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1924.

"(Signed) E. F. LADD,

"Chairman Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

"[Indorsed on the reverse by signature of David S. Barry, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States.]

"Mr. SINCLAIR, I thank you very much, gentlemen.

"The CHAIRMAN, Mr. Hays?"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the provisions of the statute applicable to the conditions before us in consequence of this action are sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

SEC. 101. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

SEC. 102. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

SEC. 103. No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous.

SEC. 104. Whenever a witness, summoned as mentioned in section 102, fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact, under the seal of the Senate or House, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

Mr. President, in view of the recusancy of the witness shown by the report just submitted, there are two questions open to the Senate, either to bring the witness before the bar of the Senate and, persisting in his contumacy, to commit him to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms for imprisonment until he shall consent to answer, or to report the matter, as contemplated by the statute which I have just read, for appropriate action by the district attorney of the District of Columbia and a grand jury. The committee is not prepared this afternoon to ask the Senate to take either of these courses. The Members are desirous, among other things, of conferring with counsel employed to aid us in these proceedings, and we shall probably be ready to take action on the matter on Monday.

The questions presented, however, are of the most far-reaching and profound importance. Much is said in the statement of the witness, which has been read for your information, about the importance upon the question presented of the pendency of the suit instituted in the United States District Court for the District of Wyoming to cancel and annul the lease of the Mammoth Oil Co. to naval reserve No. 3. But the objection of the witness is much more fundamental than that. It challenges the right of any committee of either House of Congress to compel the attendance of a witness to give any testimony before such a committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question before he discusses that point?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether in his judgment both courses could not be pursued. The Senator said we could take one of two courses. What is to hinder and what is the objection to both courses being pursued? In other words, if a witness who refuses to answer was brought to the bar of the Senate and confined by order of the Senate in jail until he answered, would that be any reason why he should not be punished in regular court proceedings according to the statute which the Senator has read?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am sure that either of the remedies is exclusive of the other as matter of law, but as matter of practice they become practically so, I think. The situation would be this: If the witness were brought before the bar of the Senate and an order, after his commitment, were made to the effect that he should stand committed until he should answer—I assume that he is in perfect good faith in the objection that he makes and in the position that he takes—he would, of course, then sue out a writ of habeas corpus, and he would be held under that writ. If the court should decide against him, that his objection is not well taken, he would be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms. He would then sue out a writ of error, and he would be entitled to bail under that writ of error.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I am trying to call to the attention of the Senator I could well illustrate by saying that if he came to the Senate under arrest, and it was ordered that he should be confined to jail until he answered, whenever he answered he would clear himself of the contempt proceedings here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But the statute which the Senator has read makes it an offense for a person to refuse to answer in either case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly, and he would be guilty of a crime.

Mr. NORRIS. He would be guilty of a crime independently of the contempt proceeding.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That crime would have been already committed.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course we know that if a court should hold that he was right in his objection, that the questions were not properly asked, and that the witness was not required to answer, the court would give him freedom in either case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt him, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As the Senator has allowed himself to be interrupted a number of times at this point, perhaps this is a good time to ask a question. Will the Senator again kindly read the latter portion of the statute that he last read to us? I refer to the portion of the paragraph which provides that the committee shall report the refusal to answer, and then that the President of the Senate—if I heard the reading correctly—should certify that fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The section reads as follows:

Whenever a witness, summoned as mentioned in section 102, fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate, or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact, under the seal of the Senate or House, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator, in view of that language, does he not consider it to be the duty of the President of the Senate now to certify the fact to the district attorney, irrespective of any action of the Senate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The language—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is mandatory.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The language is not so clear as it might be. It will be observed that the first thing is that the witness must have failed to testify. I imagine that some one must decide whether or not he has failed to testify. The committee has reported that he has so failed, but I suppose the Senate must first decide whether, as a matter of fact, the witness has failed to testify, and if the Senate decides that he has failed to testify, then it automatically becomes the duty of the President of the Senate to report that fact.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the language of the statute read "when such failure is reported to the Senate," and so forth?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes. Two things must occur: The witness must have failed, and that fact must have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course I am not holding the Senator to a final opinion, but, as at present advised, does the Senator think that the Senate should find as a fact that the witness had failed to testify?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should think so. Suppose, for instance, that one member of the committee should come in and tell the Senate that a witness had failed to testify; or, we will suppose, for that matter, that some onlooker had so stated or that some Member of the Senate had come in and had told the Senate that a witness had failed to testify, of course it would not then be the duty of the President of the Senate to certify the fact that the witness had so failed. Now, the committee, as a whole, has come in and has advised the Senate of the fact, and it seems to me there must be a determination by the Senate that the witness has failed to testify.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had not taken the broad interpretation of the word "report" that the Senator suggests might prevail. I thought the provision meant whenever the committee having jurisdiction of the matter had reported to the Senate that the witness has refused to testify or failed to testify before it, the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, he will observe that the statute does not say "when the facts are reported to either House by the committee"; it merely says when the facts are reported to either House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It never occurred to me to construe the word "report" as meaning that a single Senator might stand up and say that it was so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not mean to assert that the position the Senator from Connecticut advances about the matter is not correct; but my own judgment is that the Senate ought to determine the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I assume that there is no time limit within which the President pro tempore must act. The statute does not say that he must do it immediately. Of course there is time for consideration as to the proper course to pursue.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana as to his construction of the language of section 102, which is as follows:

or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the question under inquiry.

Does not that language indicate that there must be a refusal to answer and that the question must be pertinent, and does not that indicate that the Senate, as a whole, would have to determine the question before the President of the Senate would be called upon to take the action which is prescribed in section 104?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question. The failure of the witness, of course, must be a failure before either the Senate or a committee of the Senate. When that failure occurs, no individual member of the committee can report it. It must be, as it is in this case, the report of the committee. Therefore does not the Senator think, under section 104, that when a witness has been summoned and fails to testify, and the facts are reported, bearing in mind that there can not be a report by an individual member—the very fact that a report is made indicates that the committee reports—then the President of the Senate as a matter of course certifies the facts to the district attorney for presentation to the grand jury?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question still is an open one as to who determines, first, the pertinency of the question, and, second, whether the witness has failed to testify or not.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does it not occur to the Senator from Montana that the word "report" in dealing with matters before a committee has the technical meaning that the committee shall make the report?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am inclined to agree to that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then if that be true, and if that were not the thing upon which the President of the Senate should act, would it not say upon the adoption of the report by the Senate, or upon the recommendation of the Senate, the President of the Senate shall transmit the facts? Does not the language make it absolutely imperative, when the committee shall have reported the facts, to transmit that report to the district attorney, who then shall act? Otherwise, it would be upon the adoption of the report by the Senate that the President shall transmit it; in other words, when the committee reports, it seems to me that the Senate has nothing more to do with it, but the President of the Senate must transmit the report.

Mr. SPENCER. Does the Senator from Montana intend to ask for action this afternoon?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is there any doubt in the Senator's mind that the witness did fail to testify?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. None whatever.

Mr. President, I merely desire to add a few observations. As I have pointed out, a considerable portion of the statement made by the witness in justification of his refusal to answer the questions propounded to him is based upon the pendency of the lawsuit. Section 103 of the statute provides:

No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any facts, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous.

That is, the statute has gone so far as to provide that, no matter how much the testimony given by a witness may tend to degrade him in the public estimation or to render him infamous or to bring him into disgrace, that is no reason why he should not answer the pertinent questions that are asked him. Mr. President, I know of no rule of law which will exempt a witness from testifying upon the ground that he has a lawsuit pending somewhere in which his interest will be affected if he gives testimony in another proceeding.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to ask the Senator a further question about the duty of the President of the Senate when the report of the committee shall be received. I understood the Senator from Montana a while ago to say—and I believe it was also the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]—that the Senate must determine the pertinency of the questions. The rule is that the committee shall determine the pertinency of questions, is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Therefore, that question would not be considered by the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in view of the last remark of the Senator from Montana, that he did not think a witness was excused from testifying—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to say a word further in reply to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Arkansas will give me his attention, I should like to say that, of course, it is altogether within the province of the committee to determine the pertinency of questions addressed to the witness, but I do not think by any means that that is final. It certainly would not be final if a motion were made to cite a witness to the bar of the Senate for contempt.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to say, Mr. President, that in the very nature of things that would simply be prima facie. When it is further provided in section 104 that when such report is made to the Senate, the President of the Senate will certify the facts under the seal of the Senate to the district attorney, it necessarily follows that either the President of the Senate or the Senate itself must determine to be true what the committee has found prima facie, namely, that it has propounded a pertinent question and the witness has refused to answer that pertinent inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Unless the Senator from Arkansas desires to ask me a further question, I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am having the record examined; but in 1894, I believe it was, there was an investigation by a committee of the Senate of charges that Senators had been speculating in sugar stocks. The witness, Mr. Chapman, a member of a large brokerage firm in New York, declined to testify as to the purchase of stock through his firm by any Member of the Senate. Judge Gray, who was then a Senator from Delaware and chairman of the committee, reported the fact to the Senate, and my memory is—and I hesitate to trust to memory so far back—that it was determined to be the duty of the President of the Senate to report it, without further action, to the district attorney. At all events, that is what was done, and Mr. Chapman was tried and convicted and went to jail for three months.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, referring to the statement of the Senator from Montana that the witness would not be excused from testifying, because he might have a lawsuit about the same matter pending in another place, I agree with the Senator about that; but, as I listened to the reading of the statement made by Mr. Sinclair before the committee, I understood that he went further than that, if I caught the meaning correctly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He seemed to claim that because the Senate had authorized the institution of the lawsuit against him, and the President had brought it through the special counsel, the committee in some way was ousted of further jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is correct. Three contentions were made. In the first place, the contention is made that the witness ought not to be called upon to answer concerning these matters because of the pendency of the lawsuit. The second contention is that he ought not to be compelled to answer because the committee was ousted of all jurisdiction it had when Joint Resolution 74 was passed. The third is that he ought not to be compelled to answer because under no circumstances can a witness be forced to come before a committee of either House of Congress or forced to testify when he does come there.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For any purpose?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For any purpose; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the only one of those objections that is debatable is the last one. I do not see how the mere fact that a lawsuit is pending could possibly give any basis for objection, or the fact that the committee has made a report in part.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I remind the Senator from Idaho, as I stated this morning before the committee, that the committee has made no report up to the present time. The report that the Senate has heard this afternoon is the first report the committee has made. It will be recalled that the action taken by the Senate was taken first upon the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who is not a member of the committee at all, and that a substitute was offered by myself, not by the committee, but by myself, acting in my own right as a Senator, the same as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] acted in his own right.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, at a meeting of the committee, however, it was agreed that the committee would indorse and support the principle of the substitute joint resolution which I had said I would offer as an amendment to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas. So the committee has made no report on anything. Furthermore, Mr. President, the committee has not by any means concluded its work; and I think it is in the mind of every member of the committee to recommend to the Congress legislation which will help, at least, to prevent a recurrence of this wanton abuse of power of which, as we contend, the heads of departments have been guilty under the act as it stands.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I desire to say something in that connection.

Some considerable criticism has been directed against the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, as the author of the statute under which these leases were made, and an effort has been made to involve me in that criticism. I have heretofore stated to the Senate the facts with respect to that matter. I had nothing whatever to do with it; but I fear that it might have been inferred from something I said that Secretary Daniels was blamable in the matter. I want to disclaim any such purpose. I do not see that Secretary Daniels is open to any criticism whatever in the matter, except that he might have been a little more guarded in the powers that he contemplated reposing in the Secretary of the Navy. The act ought to be restricted, as I think, and I think the committee will recommend legislation to that effect; but, of course, it was drafted in the first place upon the assumption that it would be executed by honest officials, by officials diligent and vigilant in the discharge of their duties. No legislation that we can enact in this body can ever be made safe against corruption, and this particular statute is no exception to it. We pass many statutes here reposing power in officers of the Government. We expect that they are going to discharge their duties faithfully and with regard to the settled policy of the Government with reference to these powers. It is a very old and a very well-established principle that power may be abused, whatever safeguards are put about it. It is necessary to trust to some extent to the honesty and to the vigilance of the officials charged with the execution of the duties. As I say, however, we can safeguard the thing by some restrictive amendments.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Montana was not any more responsible for that legislation than every other Member of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No. I bear my fair share of it.

Mr. BORAH. But I do think that all of us, if we had it to do over again, would restrict the terms of that act, in view of what has happened; but that is not a responsibility which attaches to an individual. That is a responsibility which attaches to the Senate.

I want to say here that I hope the experience which we have had will warn us against accepting just any amendment which comes down here from a department. Because an amendment is drawn in a department, and it is so stated on the floor of the Senate, we have been in the habit of simply passing it over without very much scrutiny, which we do with too much carelessness. I trust that in the future we will examine an amendment just as carefully when it comes from a department as if it is drawn here; and, in my judgment, that is about all the criticism that can be lodged against that particular provision.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I may say that I am in entire agreement with the Senator from Idaho. I think we ought to be particularly scrupulous in the future about vesting in the heads of these departments large powers, with little limitations or restrictions, not hedged about at all. These statutes are not made for to-day or for to-morrow, but they are made for all time, and some time or other a reckless or an incompetent man will be charged with the administration of these duties.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I of course agree to everything that the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Idaho have said; but I should like to get the Senate back to the question at bar.

As I understand, the only question now is whether the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall certify these proceedings to the prosecuting attorney, or whether the Senate will pass a resolution authorizing or directing him to do it. If the Senator from Montana would prefer that the Senate act and direct the Presiding Officer to do that, I, for one, shall be glad to take that action now, if the Senator wants it, or to wait until Monday, as he sees fit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is very nice of the Senator. I think the appropriate action is for the Senate to resolve that the witness has failed to testify.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so. I think that will do away with any technicalities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It will remove any question, and that is what I want to do.

Mr. NORRIS. And I suppose the Senator will present that kind of a resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is my purpose to do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if what the Senator from Nebraska suggests were done, would it then be in order for the Senate to suggest that he should testify, or permit the committee to go back and try him out again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the committee has gotten through with the witness. We have exhausted our power to get an answer from him. We are reporting that fact to the Senate. If this is reported to the district attorney for the consideration of the grand jury, the grand jury will proceed either to indict or to return no bill. If they return an indictment, he will be tried upon the indictment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Montana leaves the floor I desire to ask him a question. It may be entirely overrefined and technical, but I assume that the paper which has just been read from the desk, which was presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], is to be the basis—if the last section of the statute read by the Senator is proceeded with strictly—of an attempt to commit Mr. Sinclair to jail for contempt, and to bring upon his head, possibly, the pains and penalties prescribed in the statute. Now, the statute provides that certain action shall be taken when the refusal to answer shall be reported to the Senate. I assume that means as a fact. Since this is the basis of the whole proceeding I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the paper which the reading clerk has just read to Senate is headed in this way:

Before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the United States Senate, proceeding under Senate Resolution No. 147, Harry F. Sinclair, called to the stand as a witness before the committee, made the following statement—

And then, after a few pages, it states:

Thereupon the following proceedings were had—

That consisted simply of some questions asked by the members of the committee, and the replies of Mr. Sinclair refusing to answer. That does not seem to me to be a report of the committee with the finding of the committee back of it that the man in fact did refuse or fail to answer upon which it would be safe to base proceedings for commitment for contempt. As

I say, it may be an overrefinement and a technicality merely, but if it is a criminal suit I think perhaps the foundation could be more securely laid for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My view about that matter is that the offense defined by section 102 of the statute depends in no manner whatever upon compliance with section 104.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; the commission of the offense does not, but I assume that the reporting to the Senate of the commission of the offense is a necessary condition precedent to a successful prosecution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The only importance that might be given to any inadequacy of the report now submitted by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys would be this: If the district attorney should refuse to bring the matter to the attention of the grand jury, it would be a question then as to whether or not this was sufficient. My own view about the matter is that it would not be proper for the committee to report that Mr. Sinclair, being a witness before the committee, refused or failed to testify, and to make such a report as that to the Senate; that we should report the facts to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hear what the Senator says, but I do not see the impropriety of the committee saying that in its opinion Mr. Sinclair had refused to testify, and I think it would be a fair inference from the facts stated that he has.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can see no impropriety in it in connection with the statement of the facts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I do not gather from the statute that it is necessary for the committee to report to the President of the Senate, and for the President of the Senate to certify the matter to the district attorney, in order to make the crime complete.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then I just misunderstood the Senator. It would make no difference how that information reached the district attorney, provided competent testimony was put before the grand jury; the grand jury would have a right to return a true bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. This is important only as it affects the question as to whether the district attorney did or did not move when he ought to have moved, as it seems to me.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I think we should facilitate the decision of this question in any way we possibly can. In a word, I want to present the question to the Senate as I understand it to be, for it seems to me one of exceeding importance.

The fundamental question which will be decided by the courts in this case is this: Has the Senate, or any committee of the Senate, the power to go into a man's private papers, private business, personal conduct, to secure information for the Senate which may be a basis for legislation in the future, or to correct legislation in the past?

The contention is made in this case that that is a judicial function, and not a legislative function, and that a man's business and a man's papers and a man's personal conduct can not be examined into in a legislative proceeding for the purpose merely of securing information. I say to the Senator in all candor that I think the question is one of tremendous importance.

We have for a hundred years, perhaps, certainly for more than one generation or two, gone on the assumption that the Senate can inquire into anything, and compel a man who has committed no crime, who has done nothing wrong, to bring his business, his papers, his information, his conduct, before a public inquiry of a committee of the Senate, and then proclaim it to the world for our information. That is challenged now, and the challenge is worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator from Idaho yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the question presented by the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, to which the Senate has just listened, may be a very interesting one, but it is not here at all. There is no question of the presentation of any private paper. Nothing of that kind is involved in the controversy. Nor is there any question about the private business concerns of anybody. Let us disabuse ourselves of that idea right at the start.

The contract in question is between the Government of the United States on the one side and the Mammoth Oil Co. on the other, not Harry Sinclair. Mr. Sinclair was a witness, the same as any other witness. Senators will observe that a question was propounded to him this morning as to certain transactions between the Mammoth Oil Co. and the Pioneer Oil Co., concerning which he refused to testify. He was also interrogated as to whether he had produced the books of the Hyva Corporation, and he declined to answer, and heretofore has declined to produce the books of the Hyva Corporation. We never asked Mr. Sinclair to produce his private books or his private papers. We never inquired into his private business, or anything of the kind.

The rule is perfectly well established, Mr. President, that even in a criminal case a man can not refuse to produce the books of a corporation, even though that corporation is what is spoken of as a private corporation, or a personal corporation, as it is sometimes called.

Take the Hyva Corporation. That is said to be a personal corporation. Mr. Sinclair passes through that formality matters of a personal character, but it does not make any difference how personal they are, the Hyva Corporation is an individual, just the same as John Jones is an individual, or Peter Robinson is an individual. It does not make a bit of difference that Mr. Sinclair is an officer of that corporation. It does not make a bit of difference that he is a stockholder of that corporation.

It does not make a bit of difference that he is the sole stockholder of that corporation; he can not claim any exemption from producing the books of the Mammoth Oil Co. or the Hyva Corporation. That has been so well settled by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as to be put past any controversy or question.

But even if it is a matter of the private business of a private person, let me remark that the attorney for Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Stanford, told us that the Hyva Corporation was a personal corporation of Mr. Sinclair; that he handles his personal and private business through that corporation. It was organized, among other reasons, for the purpose of escaping the income tax. That was one purpose. That is a good purpose, perhaps; but when Mr. Sinclair chooses to escape his just share of the taxes to support the Government of the United States by putting his private affairs into corporate form he has to take the consequences, namely, that that is a corporation whose books and papers are open to inspection at any time, and they are divested of the character of private papers and books and private business.

I go a little further than that. Let us assume that some man who has not resorted to this method of escaping Federal taxes handles his own business in his own name. Let us assume that he has certain information which, of course, he got in the course of his business; that he has certain information about a matter of public interest; that he has certain information which the Senate of the United States can not get from any other source and which it needs in order to be advised as to whether certain legislation before it is wise or unwise, as to whether the Congress of the United States ought to take this course or that course. What is the difference, whether it is his private business or his private information or whether it is the private business of some one else?

Of course, there is not a fact or circumstance that happens in human life which is not the private affair of somebody. This "private" business does not appeal to me.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, with the courtesy of the Senator from Idaho, I may be permitted to say that the Senator from Montana has ended precisely where I began; that is, that there is no difference between the private papers of a private individual and the papers and business of a corporation; that the question in issue in this case is this: Can the Senate or its committee, merely for information, compel a man or compel a corporation—and the Senator says there is no difference between the two, to which I agree—to bring their papers, their conduct, their business, before a committee for investigation? I say to the Senator that there is a grave question about the Senate having any such power, and I hope we agree, and I am sure we do, that it is a fortunate thing that that question in this case will now be decided for all time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not understand that it makes any difference whether it is the papers of an individual or the papers of a private corporation, unless the witness is claiming exemption on the ground that his testimony will incriminate him. That is not the ground upon which this witness bases his plea.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is quite correct in saying that even if he were claiming it upon that ground, if the papers were the papers of a corporation, he would not be permitted to withhold them upon that ground. It would make a difference if he were claiming exemption and they were private papers, but that is not the contention which the attorneys for Mr. Sinclair are making. They are contending that the Senate has no right to call for information in the hands of any individual for the purpose of legislating.

The Senator from Missouri is quite right, if that is true, in stating that it is a matter of extraordinary moment. I do not want to discuss the question so late in the afternoon; but the case of Kilbourn against Thompson has been cited, and heretofore discussed in the newspapers throughout the country, as sustaining the contention of the attorneys for Mr. Sinclair.

In the case of Kilbourn against Thompson the Supreme Court specifically stated that it was not passing upon that question at all; that it declined to pass upon any other question than the particular question which was before the court, which was whether the committee could call for information which was concededly information relative to a lawsuit, and about which it was not suggested that the Congress intended to take any action in the way of legislation at all.

The court held in that case that by reason of the fact that the matter was in litigation, and that the House committee was not proposing to gather information for the purpose of legislation, they would decide it upon the sole question of whether they could call for information which was peculiarly information designed to enable a judicial body to pass upon a particular question.

I will read just a paragraph from that case, and that will be all I desire to say this afternoon. After reviewing the English cases and reviewing the power of Parliament to cite for contempt, the court said:

Taking what has fallen from the English judges, and especially the later cases on which we have just commented, is much aid given to the doctrine that this power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully their function of legislation.

This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case, because we are able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, the court has never decided the question now before us, and there are no decisions sustaining the contention made by the counsel for Mr. Sinclair upon the proposition which is now before us.

Again, the court said:

The resolution adopted as a sequence of this preamble contains no hint of any intention of final action by Congress on the subject. In all the argument of the case no suggestion has been made of what the House of Representatives or the Congress could have done in the way of remedying the wrong or securing the creditors of Jay Cooke & Co., or even the United States. Was it to be simply a fruitless investigation into the personal affairs of individuals? If so, the House of Representatives had no power or authority in the matter more than any other equal number of gentlemen interested for the government of their country. By "fruitless" we mean that it could result in no valid legislation on the subject to which the inquiry referred.

So it ought to be borne in mind, while we are discussing the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, that the court specifically except that proposition from their decision.

Mr. ADAMS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator suggests that the matter has not been decided. I simply suggest that, in my judgment, the principle involved has been decided, in a case in One hundred and fifty-fourth United States Reports, involving the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to examine witnesses; and that was reaffirmed in Two hundred and eleventh United States Reports. I do not happen to have the page and the title of the case, but I have examined the decision, and I think the Senator will find the principle involved very clearly stated.

Mr. BORAH. I examined that case last night; but, in my opinion, the proposition which is now before this body, or which will be finally submitted to a court, has not been decided by the court of last resort in this country, or by any court, so far as I can find. Some similar principles and kindred principles have been passed upon, but when the Congress of the United States is asking for information which will aid it in legislation, which it could be said in good faith is designed for the purpose of aiding in legislation, in my opinion the witness must answer, unless he claims that the answer would incriminate him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. It seems to me the decision from which the Senator just read indeed goes too far in its dictum in placing a limitation upon the powers of Congress. If Congress is not seeking legislation, but is seeking a legitimate inquiry into matters affecting the Government and the legislative branch of the Government, the power of inquiry exists and the power to punish as prescribed by the statute is involved.

I want to ask the Senator whether a recent decision of the Supreme Court, which I have not had opportunity to examine, in reviewing the action of the Federal Trade Commission, throws any light upon the question or attempts in any way to limit the powers of a body, judicial or quasi judicial, administrative or legislative, to make inquiry into the affairs of private individuals?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think that decision throws any light upon this particular question. I have not examined it since this question came up, but I did so at the time it came out.

Mr. KING. The case to which I have reference was only decided within the past few days, and I have had no chance to examine the advance sheets.

Mr. BORAH. The case was reported pretty fully in the New York papers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have examined the opinion, and my understanding is that it asserts the proposition that under the existing Federal Trade Commission act there is no general power to examine the books and records of a corporation. There must be some particular matter pending and the examination must be confined to the particular matter under inquiry. The decision goes no further than to mention the authority of Congress to give the inquisitorial power to the Federal Trade Commission. The court said that if such a general power were conferred by the statute it might then be an interesting and perhaps important question to inquire whether it is competent for the Congress to repose such power in the commission, but it found it unnecessary to go into that question because it was held that no such power was conferred by the act.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, the decision does not in any way abridge the right and authority of the Federal Trade Commission to discharge the duties which Congress sought to impose upon that important body.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the way the court held.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand no action is desired to-night. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, March 24, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 22, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Give ear, O Lord, unto our prayer and listen unto the voice of our supplications. We bow at Thy altar to claim Thy mercy in the forgiveness of our sins and beseech Thee to extend Thy arm of sheltering care. Bless us with a sweet, uncomplaining faith, obedient to all Thy providential dispensations. Supply all our hearts with an affection that strengthens and refines them, and direct our wills to cling to the will of God. Be present in the labors of this day. O God of wisdom and Prince of Peace, guard with watchful eye the affairs of our beloved country and give divine guidance to all who make and execute the laws of the land. O lead us as a people to know that it is righteousness that exalteth a nation and that the Galilean Teacher has made revelation of the sublimest truth that ever entered the conception of mortal man. May the light of His cross shine forth and direct us in the paths of His glorious truths. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE HON. B. G. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, that Sunday, the 6th day of April, 1924, at 11 o'clock a. m., be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS, late Representative from the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

GEN. SMEDLEY D. BUTLER.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday when we were considering the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Vinson] providing that no officer of the Navy or Marine Corps shall, unless the President otherwise directs, be entitled to any pay or allowances while on leave of absence for a period in excess of that for which he is entitled to full pay, I brought to the attention of the House that the amendment was suggested in line with the recommendation of Gen. Smedley D. Butler, who is now on leave and who is law-enforcement officer in Philadelphia.

I read to the House the telegram from General Butler urging the legislation, and through inadvertence I omitted it from the RECORD on yesterday.

I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The telegram is as follows:

JANUARY 5, 1924.

HON. BURTON FRENCH,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Before entering service of city of Philadelphia as its director of public safety, I desire that you know I do not intend to accept any part of my pay or allowances as a Marine officer during my connection with Philadelphia. Welcome any change in basic law providing for this loss of pay.

SMEDLEY D. BUTLER,

Brigadier General United States Marines.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the RECORD. Under date of March 10 there was presented from my office a petition by Rev. Florence E. Gilbert and others, No. 1663, found on page 3937. The RECORD then recites that the petitioners are in favor of a uniform marriage and divorce law. I desire to have the record changed so it will appear that this petition and resolutions in connection therewith be stated as bearing upon the matter of uniform marriage and divorce laws and collateral matters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for another correction of the RECORD?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I withhold it and then I will renew it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the request contained in this petition and resolutions I ask this petition be temporarily withdrawn from the Judiciary Committee and that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the petition be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan what that petition is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Michigan. It is a petition bearing upon this matter and it would take about two or two and a half pages of the RECORD.

Mr. BEGG. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the gentleman's interest in his constituency, but I do not believe that is the purpose of the RECORD, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. BLANTON. I think I can avoid that roll call if the gentleman will permit—

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I withdraw the demand.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the naval appropriation bill, and the previous question has been ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to recommit the bill, which motion the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment: On page 48, lines 10 and 11, strike out the words "or other time-measuring device," and in line 12 strike out the words "or the movements of any such employee while engaged on such work."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid upon the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for recognition for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for recognition for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, I think it would be of great interest and benefit to the House if the gentleman from Ohio would state to us the legislative program, in so far as he can, for the next week or two weeks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be glad to do so. It is expected on Monday to act on several rules, among them the consideration of the so-called German relief bill. On Tuesday—and I hope the gentleman from Kansas will have concluded the general debate on the Army bill to-day—the Army bill will be taken up. After the Army bill it is expected that the independent offices appropriation bill will be taken up and disposed of. That will dispose of the Navy, the Army, and the independent offices appropriation bills.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand what the gentleman said about the independent offices appropriation bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is to follow immediately after the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Calendar Wednesday will not be dispensed with, or does the gentleman know about it?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries is very anxious to consider some bills on that day. I have not consulted with any Members about the advisability of it. If we have Calendar Wednesday, the bills from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries will be considered; if not, the Army bill will go on. Immediately after the passage of the independent offices bill it is expected that the immigration bill will be considered, and a rule brought in for its consideration, and it may be possible that during the consideration of the immigration bill the contested-election case of Chandler against Bloom will be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand the gentleman to say that during the time the immigration bill is pending it may be taken up, or when?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Either at the conclusion or perhaps during the general debate. That has not been decided upon. I have heard it suggested.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That will probably mean, so far as we can speculate about it, that the immigration bill would not be reached before Friday or Saturday of next week?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I should personally very much doubt whether it would be reached next week or not, although the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is hopeful that both the Army bill and the independent offices bill will be disposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to be able to finish the Army bill and the independent offices bill by Friday night of next week.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In that case the immigration bill would come up on Saturday. In any event it will follow immediately after the disposition of the independent offices bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then there is not the slightest probability of the contested-election case coming up next week?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; I think there is no possibility of it; in fact, I am sure of it.

Mr. SNELL. I do not think there is a possibility of getting any start on it next week—that is, the immigration bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It may be started on Saturday, but it will take some days.

Mr. SNELL. The immigration bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; the immigration bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A good many of my colleagues have been looking for the posting of a bulletin.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For the past two weeks I have been posting a bulletin. I think that is fairly accurate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Where is that posted?

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the board behind the Speaker's chair. I have endeavored to be as accurate as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman when there will be further consideration of the Private Calendar?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be glad to assign any evening that will be satisfactory to the House.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I hope when the gentleman makes the motion to take up the Private Calendar he will apply to it the rule that there must be at least three objections to prevent the consideration of a bill. Last night we had a performance here that demonstrated how absolutely the House is in the hands of one man, when it is possible for a single Member to control consideration by his objection. I think in fairness to the House the gentleman ought to think of the expediency of making the rule a little more liberal.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That had not occurred to me before. I doubt whether under the rules, as they are at present, it would be possible.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it will be perfectly possible, providing you have a quorum here—it will be perfectly possible to consider the Private Calendar and pass a bill, if you get a majority vote, if you can get a quorum.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The usual procedure—and I think that was my request—is to consider bills unobjected to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. That is true; but that is just a method adopted by the agreement of the House. Of course, if the Private Calendar were called in the usual way, one objection would not suffice to prevent consideration of a bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the rule requiring three objections at a time applies to the Consent Calendar, not to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes. I was asking the gentleman to think of the wisdom and fairness of modifying the method that prevailed last night when he makes another motion similar to that which brought on last night's session.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman thinks of modifying the rule?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; so that one gentleman, however excellent he may be and however good a friend he may be to other gentlemen, may not have his own way entirely.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, as I said before, whenever you have a quorum a majority can pass a bill. But if for the convenience of those who have private bills on the calendar a special time is established or set aside at an hour when the House will be without a quorum, when one objection can stop or prevent the consideration of a bill, and then certain gentlemen make an agreement that certain amendments will be made, then I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that under any kind of an agreement you have such agreements must be lived up to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. They have been lived up to.

Mr. CRAMTON. They certainly have been lived up to. I have the fullest confidence in the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman from Michigan was strictly within his rights last night. He was one of the 60 men who stayed here until 11 o'clock. He was right.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] yield to me, in order that I may ask the majority leader a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7877, making appropriations for the War Department for the fiscal year 1925.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7877, making appropriations for the War Department.

Mr. ANTHONY. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] if we can agree upon an amount of time for general debate on the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I sincerely trust that we may be able to agree. This bill carries far more than $300,000,000 and is open to some discussion, and I, as the ranking Democrat on the subcommittee, want at least an hour. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], another member of the subcommittee, wishes an hour, and three other gentlemen, members of the Committee on Appropriations, have asked me for half an hour each. So the gentleman can see from that—and they are legitimate demands—that we must have some little time for discussion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that the desire has been expressed to me that general debate on this bill be limited to this day, and with that idea in mind I want to suggest to the gentleman that general debate be limited to four and a half hours.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I very greatly trust that the gentleman will not insist on that for this reason: That nobody can foresee how many roll calls we may have during the day, and that would shorten the time for discussion. I can say further that my remarks will be confined to the bill itself; the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] will be confined to the bill, and the others say the same thing.

There is a real desire to discuss this bill, but if the time should be fixed by hours rather than by the day it would certainly be more equitable. I can see no reason at all for any particular hurry on this bill, and I hope the gentleman entertains no idea of shutting off debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on this bill be limited to four and one-half hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and one-half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then it would seem that that length of time would only give time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] and myself.

Mr. ANTHONY. On this side of the House we have condensed all the applications for time and will try to compact them into that 2 hours and 15 minutes, with the idea of expediting the legislation, and I want to express the hope that we can finish general debate on this bill to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not believe that the cutting off of general debate will gain anything, for the reason that those who are cut off will later avail themselves many times of the five-minute rule, and we shall really lose time rather than gain it.

I wonder whether the gentleman would agree to this proposition: To proceed as far as possible to-day without agreeing upon hours, and then seeing what we can agree to late this afternoon or Monday morning as to time. There is no particular reason why a real demand for shortening the time for discussion upon such an important bill is fair.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman can readily see that that will sadly disarrange the legislative program which was discussed between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] awhile ago.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But I trust that that ex parte arrangement has not been made for the purpose of shutting off debate on this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I did not understand it to be an arrangement, if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. ANTHONY. I spoke of it as a discussion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Kentucky referred to it as an ex parte arrangement, but the gentleman from Ohio simply announced what was in his mind as to the legislative program, and he did not put any time limit on this debate.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. May I say this: On every other appropriation bill that has been up for consideration the chairman in charge of the bill has been extremely liberal as to time for general debate. That was true of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], and that has been true on two other occasions—as to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and also as to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHAMBERS] with reference to the Interior Department appropriation bill. It does seem to me that the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, that we proceed with debate to-day and then late this afternoon or Monday morning agree upon some time, is a fairly reasonable request.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say that I have every desire to accommodate the gentleman from Kentucky with all the time needed for a discussion of the vital things contained in this bill, and I know there are some things in the bill that the gentleman wants to talk about, and he should talk about considerably. But I think under the five-minute rule we can perhaps accommodate him and some of the other gentlemen.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe that the gentleman from Kansas is anticipating some of the subjects which I wish to discuss, but I wish to say to the gentleman that those subjects can not properly be discussed under the five-minute rule, and when we get under the five-minute rule somebody may object to my having more than five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I will take the matter up with the gentleman later on in the afternoon.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the time be controlled equally by myself and by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally by himself and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the gentleman from Kansas that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7877, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is the measure which carries the money for the conduct of the activities of the War Department for the next fiscal year. It does not alone cover the expense of the United States Army but provides as well for the river and harbor work, which as you know is done under the supervision of the engineers of the War Department. It covers also the operations of the Panama Canal, of the National Soldiers' Homes, and of a multitude of other smaller activities of the Government which are in charge of the War Department or under its supervision.

This bill carries a total of $326,224,003.13. It represents a reduction from the Budget estimates of $3,632,777.87 and a reduction under the appropriations for the current year of $16,224,267.87. It is interesting in this connection to give some consideration to the figures of the cost of the Army in the years following the war, taking first the cost of the Military Establishment in the fiscal year, 1921, which was the first year in which the appropriations were not considerably increased by reason of carrying over items from the war. In that year the cost of our Army was $473,000,000. In 1922 the cost was reduced to $345,000,000. In 1923 the cost was still further reduced to $263,000,000. In 1924 the cost was reduced to $251,000,000, and this bill carries for the Army itself $254,000,000, an increase for purely military purposes of nearly $3,000,000 over the current year.

This is accounted for by the fact that the Army has consumed many of the stores with which it was well supplied when we came out of the war. We find that the horses, for instance, are now running down in number and that a considerable percent of the animals in the Army are now 14 years of age or over, and the time has arrived when we should begin to replace them with younger animals.

We are beginning this year to undertake the much-needed work of construction in the Army. We are going to build some modern barracks at Fort Benning in Georgia. We are going to build a modern storehouse at Gatun in the Canal Zone. We are going to undertake some construction at West Point, which is badly needed and which has been in the approved program for many years.

This, with the increase in ordnance and engineering items for the fortification program, accounts for the increase, for the purely military purposes in this bill, over the current year.

As for the Army itself, there has been no change whatever in its size, either as to officers or men. We propose to appropriate money sufficient to maintain the Army with a maximum of 12,000 officers and 125,000 men, the same as for the current year. The present strength of the Army in enlisted men is 114,000. We have 11,650 officers, and with the graduation of this year's class at West Point we will probably have the full authorized maximum number. So all the money required to carry the Army at an average of 118,000 men, with a maximum of 125,000, and the full number of officers, is carried in this bill.

It is true that in the last few years Congress has directed that some very radical surgical operations be undertaken in reference to our Military Establishment. These operations were duly performed, and I am glad to say to the House that they were successful and that the patient recovered nicely in each instance, and to-day is in the best state of health and efficiency that it has been for many years. These congressional operations have done the Army good. They have reduced its size but increased its efficiency. Having reached the size for the Regular Army deemed most practical for the country, it should now be so maintained without further disturbance.

There are practically very few things in this bill of a controversial nature. In the few years which have followed the war, since we have brought the Army from a war to a peace basis, we have more or less standardized the expenditures under the various items in the bill, until now they have reached that point where there is but little controversy in regard to them.

One great expense in the Military Establishment, and an increasing expense, is the training activities. First, we have the National Guard, which now numbers 163,000 men. It has not grown in the last year to the size that the War Department predicted or that we had hoped. Appropriations were made last year to carry the guard this year to a maximum of 215,000 men, but the guard has not grown during the year. We are making preparations, however, this year with the idea that it will expand to a total of 190,000 by the 1st of July next, although its strength to-day is but 163,000. The reason for this failure to increase is due largely to the fact that the tables of organization prescribed by the War Department for the National Guard are so rigid in their character and provide so many technical and expensive units for the States to maintain that many of the States have reached the limit for their share to which they care to go financially and many do not have the armory facilities or the housing to properly accommodate the guard beyond its present strength, and the recommendation which our committee has repeatedly made to the War Department is that the department should modify its requirements in regard to compelling the States to organize and continue units which they do not desire to carry, and permit the guard to expand along more simple lines, such as infantry and a proper proportion of the regular branches of the service. For instance, the guard in many States is compelled by the War Department to maintain medical regiments, sanitary regiments or organizations, motor-transport organizations, and regiments of military police, which, in my opinion, should have no place whatever in our National Guard in times of peace, because these are all organizations which can be most readily put together in time of war within a few weeks' work at the most, and they should not encounter or add to the expense of the maintenance of the guard in peace time.

The next in our training activities is the Organized Reserves. This bill carries a considerable increase for the Organized Reserves over the current year. We increased the amount from $1,700,000 to $2,850,000. This amount will provide for the 15-day training of 12,000 reserve officers and 615 for longer periods, and in addition there are 5,000 reserve officers in the National Guard, making a total of over 17,000 reserve officers who will receive training under this bill. The only reduction we have made in the reserve appropriations is that we are endeavoring to hold expenditures for offices, regimental headquarters, and things of that kind within some reasonable bounds. This year they were limited to $60,000 for that purpose. During the fiscal year we permit them to increase the expenditures for rent and maintenance of regimental headquarters to $100,000, believing that to be a fairly liberal allowance. In all other respects every one of the Budget estimates for the reserves was allowed by the committee.

So also for the R. O. T. C., the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, which is the organization under which we undertake the training of young men in the schools and colleges of the country. We have 115,000 men this year under military training in the schools and colleges, in place of 110,000 last year, and we increase the appropriation by $380,000 for next year in consequence of the increased number.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In respect to the reserve officers, the committee has provided for the training of 12,000 men?

Mr. ANTHONY. Twelve thousand officers for the 15-day period.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What is the total enrollment of officers at the present time?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are 84,000 commissions in the Organized Reserves.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This would really allow training for all who want to train about every seventh year?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; as I told the gentleman, there are 5,000 reserve officers included in the National Guard, and they receive their training when the National Guard is called out, so that would make 17,000 of the 84,000 reserve officers who will be trained under this bill. In addition to that there will be 615 reserve officers trained for a longer period than 15 days, in addition to the 17,000.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that they would come up if all took it about every fifth year?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are approximately 18,000 reserve officers who will be trained during the next year under this bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. These officers who are in the National Guard do not change every year, so that you are only training 12,000 out of the 75,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. That would probably be true, and yet there are 5,000 of these National Guard officers who are also reserve officers and who get their training every year with the National Guard.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But the real merit of the thing is that these officers must have training every three years. If you provide for training only every six or seven years, you destroy the efficiency of the reserve officers. Is not that true?

Mr. ANTHONY. That depends upon whether the first statement of the gentleman is correct. I seriously doubt if all officers need training every three years. There are some of them I would not train at all, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman mentioned that the committee had made an increased appropriation for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps of $3,818,020.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Was the committee informed as to whether the number of officers that the Army now has would be sufficient to assign men for this work at the different colleges?

Mr. ANTHONY. I feel that the Army has an ample supply of officers for that purpose. In fact, there has been some criticism that there were more officers than we really needed. I do not think that is so, because I think the surplus officers can well be utilized along the lines the gentleman suggests.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman thinks there will be sufficient officer personnel to provide for the Reserve Officers' Training Corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. We have an enormous number of officers in the Regular Army now assigned to training activities—some 1,750, I think.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SWING. I personally know of several instances in my State where under present regulations, where a school has the minimum number specified by the War Department and desires to have military training, it can not secure from the War Department an instructor for that purpose. It seems to me that this proposition of training these schoolboys is the most economical and cheapest insurance the country can have, because you can train them when they are in school and you are not withdrawing them from any productive industry, and you are training them at a time when they can readily absorb and retain the information that is given to them. It is something that ought to be encouraged, instead of the Army saying that they have not sufficient officers to furnish instructors when a school has made an application.

Mr. ANTHONY. A little later on, when I can get the figures, I can show the gentleman that the Army has an unusually large number of officers who are now serving away from troops. For instance, if my memory is correct, there are over 2,000 officers of the Army who are now in the various Army schools and there are over 2,000 officers away from troops engaged in running the overhead organization of the War Department, and, as I say, 1,750 engaged in training work.

Mr. SWING. I do not care how many there are. Does not the gentleman think that as many as can be advantageously used should be used in this way? There is no better use to which to put officers than training young men who want to be trained.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], in making the statement just made, refers particularly to the commissioned officers of the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; entirely.

Mr. MCKENZIE. It has not been my understanding that there is any shortage in that respect, but that there is a shortage, or it is so alleged, in the higher grades of noncommissioned officers who are usually detailed for this particular work.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; and I agree that you can often get more practical results through the teaching of an old noncommissioned officer in certain branches of training activity than a commissioned officer.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. I am interested in the reserve officer proposition, as the gentleman knows. I would like to know what number of reserve officers applied for training last year, for instance?

Mr. ANTHONY. There were no figures given the committee this year, but I think the figures last year showed 18,000 applied, and there were 7,000 trained last year. The committee provided for 9,000, but after the passage of our appropriation bill the House passed additional legislation giving rental allowance to the reserve officer on training duty which consumed several hundred thousand dollars of the appropriation.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to know the gentleman's opinion in regard to the money we spend in the training of officers. Does not the gentleman think that we should provide money sufficient for all reserve officers who desire to be trained annually?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I can say to the gentleman I do not think we should. I think in reference to training the reserve officers we have to approach this gradually. The Regular Army to-day is not of sufficient size; it has not the troops to undertake the training of all of our reserve officers as I think they should be trained. They could not digest more than one-fourth of them, in my opinion, and give them practical training. Now, the bulk who got training last summer and the summer before consisted very largely of going to camp and hearing lectures every night, with a few little field problems. My own idea is that the reserve officer should be trained with troops in the branch of the service to which he belongs and get actual practical training, so that it will stick by him.

Mr. SNYDER. I visited three training camps last year myself, and I found in each case they did something besides lectures, and I desire to say that, in my judgment, in an emergency need a well-trained officer is the cheapest possible way of preparing the country for an emergency, and I believe that it is false economy to appropriate less than the amount of money that is necessary to train all the officers who desire to be trained in each activity annually.

Mr. ANTHONY. The next branch of training undertaken by the Army is that of the civilians, and to my mind we get nearer 100 per cent return from the money we are spending on civilian training than in any of the other branches.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to ask the gentleman a question about the new barracks which are suggested to be constructed at Gatun, Canal Zone.

Mr. ANTHONY. A storehouse.

Mr. RANKIN. A storehouse. Now, as I understand it—I may be misinformed—the barracks in the Canal Zone are located at Colon. Am I correct?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are military posts near both ends of the canal, at Colon and Panama, and about midway across.

Mr. RANKIN. At Colon, at Gatun, and also at Panama City?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. A new storage plant is needed, which eventually will replace the storage plant located up near Balboa. I do not know whether the gentleman went through the old storage warehouse with the party which was in Panama last April or not.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman will remember I was in the hospital at that time and did not make the trip.

Mr. ANTHONY. The present storage plant is a building probably 2,000 feet long, depending for part of its roof and protection from the elements upon a lot of canvas, strips of rusty iron, and things of that kind, a sort of makeshift shelter, and it was at once apparent to Members of Congress who inspected these storage facilities that a modern building was needed.

Mr. RANKIN. I desire, first, to ask this question: It seems to me that with barracks at Panama and at Colon, it would not be necessary to build one midway between them, as they are only about 38 miles apart. The next question, since the gentleman says it is to be a storage plant, is whether or not it would be sufficiently convenient to the Colon and Panama City barracks to conduct the business of the Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea of locating it at Gatun, as I understand it, is that it will be close to the water, where they will have dock facilities and probably slips will be constructed adjacent to the plant, so that ships can unload their cargoes directly at the storage plant and be distributed from there to both ends of the Canal Zone.

In reference to the civilian military training, to which I just alluded, this bill carries the small increase that is recommended by the Budget and calls for the training of approximately 28,000 men during this summer. There are about 25,000 that came to the camps this last summer. I saw one of the civilian camps, and I will say to the House that I am thoroughly convinced that the money we are spending under this head brings back, as I said, nearer 100 per cent return than any other money in the bill. I saw nearly 2,000 raw boys, most of them coming from the hills of Arkansas, Missouri, and the plains of Kansas, who, when they arrived at camp, were typical, green, and unfledged youngsters of about 18 years of age, but absolutely as unutilitary a lot of youngsters as I ever saw, but within a week or 10 days' time you never saw a finer aggregation of young American manhood in your life. They walked about with their heads erect, their shoulders thrown back, and looked like real men, like real soldiers.

The statistics that are given out this year by the officers in charge of these camps are very remarkable, from the fact that they show not only an increase of weight of 2 or 3 pounds for every man during the month's training but they show increases in chest expansion and a development that was in other ways satisfactory from the physical standpoint for these 25,000 young men that received this training.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I am delighted to hear the gentleman's statement of that particular phase of training, but does it go far enough? Could we not train as many as 50,000 or 75,000?

Mr. ANTHONY. We might train 100,000. President Harding expressed the hope that we could ultimately reach that number.

Mr. BACON. How many applied?

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand about 35,000 applied.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What is the cost per man in a civilian training camp?

Mr. ANTHONY. About $81.40 per man.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What is the cost of training reserve officers in a training camp?

Mr. ANTHONY. Last year the cost was $100. To-day it has increased to $135. Of course, it depends on the rank of the officers called out. If they are of the lower grades, the cost falls; but if they are of the higher commissioned grades, the cost goes up.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I understand this training is very valuable, but I do not believe it yields as large returns as the training of reserve officers. What becomes of these men that go to the camp? Are they enlisted in the Reserve Corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are not enlisted in the Reserve Corps, but they are permitted to pursue their military work in two successive training camps in the following years. They can then qualify for a noncommissioned status in the reserve or commissioned status, either.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But that is up to the man?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; that is up to the man.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And if he wants to he goes out and you lose all?

Mr. ANTHONY. You do not lose him. But there is no compulsory service.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Do you keep track of them?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think they do. Each corps area headquarters has a list of the men trained each year, and undoubtedly they keep the rosters.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. But the Army Reserve men are regarded as units. The others are merely enlisted men.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I understand the average cost of training civilians is $81 for a month's training, and that is compared with the cost of training a Regular soldier for the Army, which is from $1,000 to $1,500 a year?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. I thank the gentleman.

The time will not permit discussion of all the items in the bill. We will reach them under the five-minute rule. But briefly, for the information of the House, I will say that this bill carries the money to begin work on the big gun fortifications of the Panama Canal. It provides for emplacement for four 16-inch guns on the Pacific end of the canal. Instead of locating them on the island of Taboga, it is proposed to locate them on Bruja Point, across from Balboa. Probably the bill in the year following this will carry amounts for the 16-inch emplacements at the Atlantic end of the canal.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. This Bruja Point on the Pacific end of the canal that the gentleman referred to—where is that with reference to the present fortifications?

Mr. ANTHONY. The guns that the gentleman refers to are located on two or three small islands near Pacific entrance of the canal. Bruja Point, as I understand it, is directly across the bay at the mouth of the canal from those islands.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is that in what is known as the Canal Zone proper?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; that is in what is known as the Canal Zone proper, and directly across the bay.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What was the occasion of locating on this point instead of on the island of Taboga?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is quite a story connected with that. As the gentleman knows, the Secretary of War visited the canal last April, and invited a number of Members of Congress to go with him. On the steamer going down to the canal I remember we had a lecture from a member of the General Staff, the officer who had charge of this fortification work in Panama. He outlined to us the general program of fortification in the canal one night. It was that the 16-inch guns would be located on Taboga Island, lying about 8 miles out in the Pacific. When we got down to the Canal Zone, in conversation with gentlemen of our party it occurred to me that the Taboga Island project was not a practical one, and I remember I asked the Army officers the question, "How are you going to defend those 16-inch guns when you get them on Taboga Island? Are they not too far isolated out there and susceptible to attack?" This officer replied promptly, "Yes; you would have to defend them by auxiliary fortifications."

And so, instead of spending about $1,000,000 to mount these 16-inch guns out there on Taboga Island, we would have to appropriate about $12,000,000 additional, or thereabouts, to defend the 16-inch guns after we got them out there, whereas if mounted on the mainland they would practically cover the same territory and the same defensive zone and will need no auxiliary defense works to protect them. That is the argument for putting them on the Bruja Point. The Secretary of War has approved the Bruja Point site.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. And they would have about the same range of fire as they would have if located on Taboga Island or elsewhere?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not the same, but an effective range of fire, and the guns would not be so exposed to an enemy.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.
Mr. MCKENZIE. There has always been more or less of a difference of opinion as to the fortifications of the Panama Canal and the expenditure of money in different ways to fortify it.

I notice in the present bill that you have rather heavily cut into the appropriations asked for antiaircraft guns and for the France Flying Field. I would like to have the gentleman from Kansas tell us the reason why these appropriations were not granted, conceding, of course, the premise that the canal should be fortified.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will take up first the gentleman's inquiry with regard to the France Field, which is the Army flying base in Panama. They asked money with which to enlarge that field. It is not entirely safe for landing or take-off purposes at the present time. They need additional land in order to get the benefit of the prevailing winds. It involves the question of extensive filling in, the pumping of mud from the bay, and filling in this low-lying land. They asked for a total of about $250,000, and they divided it up into area A and area B.

We decided we would give them about half the money they asked for this year, because we figured they could fill in area A during the next year; and if that was a success, then during the following year we would let them fill in area B. In other words, we are taking two bites at the cherry instead of one.

In reference to the antiaircraft defense of the Panama Canal let me say that is a mooted question. There is probably no man able to make a bald assertion as to what we should or should not do in regard to the defense of so important a place as the Panama Canal. But in reference to the defense from hostile aircraft, your committee was of the belief that there is but one real defense to attacks from hostile aircraft, and that is by other aircraft. [Applause.] The Army maintains quite a sizable force of airplanes on the Canal Zone, and the Navy likewise, so that we are fairly well provided with a peace-time garrison of aircraft.

In addition there are now emplaced 35 antiaircraft guns at the vulnerable points of attack on the canal. These guns are now in position. I think they are 4-inch guns of modern type. But it is conceded that during the war for each hit obtained by an antiaircraft gun there was a cost of 15,000 rounds of ammunition expended. So when we considered the possibilities of defense from aircraft attack by these antiaircraft guns we felt we would rather rely upon airplanes of our own. Nevertheless the War Department asked for the construction of 30 more of these antiaircraft guns for Panama, to cost $30,000 apiece, or a total of $900,000. We decided we would permit them to go ahead on 15 of these guns and cut the total cost to $450,000, and we felt that would be ample under the circumstances.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will that make a total of 15 antiaircraft guns?

Mr. ANTHONY. That will make 15 new guns to be constructed under the terms of this bill for Panama.

Mr. BARBOUR. And with the 35 already installed—

Mr. ANTHONY. Would make a total of 50 altogether when these are emplaced.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Please tell us where the 4-inch antiaircraft guns, to cost $30,000 apiece, would be manufactured.

Mr. ANTHONY. They would be manufactured at our own arsenals. All of the ammunition and all of the guns provided in this bill will be manufactured at our own arsenals.

And along that line let me say to the gentleman that we came out of the war with a tremendous military manufacturing plant; our arsenal facilities were greatly expanded, and we are trying to maintain the principal arsenals intact so that in time of war and when necessity arises they can be quickly utilized. So the bill carries just enough money to maintain them in a stand-by condition, with a skeletonized working force. There is work enough in the shape of new types of guns of an experimental nature, field and coast artillery, experimental new types of ammunition, and things of that kind, to keep this skeletonized force busy during the year.

This bill also carries the appropriation for rivers and harbors, and let me say just a few words in regard to that appropriation. I want to leave that subject for discussion—when we get to the item—to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dickinson], who has made a very careful study of the river and harbor situation.

But, briefly, gentlemen, the situation is this: This bill carries $37,200,000 for rivers and harbors, the exact amount of the Budget estimate. The War Department engineers in their report this year felt they could expend next year a total of $44,000,000. The Budget allowed them $37,200,000, and we have allowed that amount.

Now, what is the situation? We find that on January 1 last there was an unexpended balance on hand of $60,000,000 of river and harbor money. We find that on July 1 next, instead of an unexpended balance of $7,000,000, as was anticipated, there will be an unexpended balance of $33,000,000, with the work going on at its present maximum month by month. We figure that if the work is allowed to continue as it is going on now, at an expenditure of about $4,800,000 a month, that by the time the 1926 bill is available, which will be in March of the following fiscal year, we shall be able to carry on this work at an expenditure of $5,000,000 a month and go into the new bill with approximately $30,000,000 on hand unexpended. So it was agreed in our committee that with $37,000,000 in this bill there would be ample money to carry on the river and harbor work at its present rate and in its present volume.

The reason why the engineers have not been able to expend all the money that was appropriated in last year's bill is, according to their statement, that they were unable to find contractors with the capacity to carry on the work in many instances, and this and other conditions has caused a slowing down in the river and harbor program. We believe that with the appropriation of this amount the work will go forward at practically the volume authorized by Congress last year.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The gentleman does not mean to say he is sorry the money has not been spent?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think we have spent all the money that could profitably be spent.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am quite sure we have.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. And some of it unprofitably.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does this bill provide for any new projects?

Mr. ANTHONY. This committee has no authority to authorize new projects. They must come from legislation from the River and Harbor Committee.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. These appropriations are for projects that have already been accepted and the work will go right on in the river and harbor improvements?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; this bill will provide sufficient funds, as I said, to carry on the work at its present rate and will leave $30,000,000 unexpended when the next river and harbor bill follows.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. In other words, they have an abundance of money to pursue the program on projects that have already been adopted?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the statement made to us.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. May I ask the gentleman just one other question? I was not present when the gentleman began his remarks and I am sorry I did not hear him. Did the gentleman state what the size of the Army will be under this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. I made the statement there would be no change whatever in the size of the Army, either as to officers or enlisted men.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What is the present enlisted strength?

Mr. ANTHONY. At present it is 114,000.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members are present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. BOX to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 100.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The report of the tellers discloses the presence of a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, first, I wish to congratulate the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] upon his wonderful knowledge of the many intricacies in this bill. He has more knowledge relative to this bill than I have ever seen displayed relative to any appropriation bill that has come before the House. [Applause.] In all of its features I do not indorse the bill. In most of them I do. There are some features of the bill which the gentleman from Kansas himself does not approve; but in every instance the result has been a case of majority rule. I trust that the bill may not be so amended that I can not vote for it on final passage.

I wish now to approach a subject, and because it contains so many figures I find it necessary that I read at least a part of my remarks, because I can not carry the many figures in mind. During the reading of that part of my remarks I shall be glad to have no gentleman interrupt me. After that, whatever questions I may be able to answer, I shall be glad, indeed, to undertake to answer.

The atmosphere around our National Capital is laden with scandal. I sincerely trust that the matter of which I am now about to speak is merely bad judgment or, at worst, a reckless expenditure of public money rather than a corrupt one. Whether it be bad judgment, recklessness, or corruption, the fact remains that more than a million dollars have been expended for a purpose for which a few thousands would have sufficed, even if the money had been used most liberally.

Several years ago there was an uprising throughout the Nation because some of the officers of the railroad corporations were receiving yearly salaries around $50,000. It was plain that the greater these salaries were the greater the rates upon freight and passengers must be in order to meet extravagant expense.

Then, about 20 years ago, when the salaries of Members of Congress were increased from $5,000 to $7,500 per year, another hue and cry went up throughout the land because such salaries were thought by the masses of the people to be too large.

Then, again, when the salary of the President of the United States was increased from $50,000 to $75,000 a year, another public protest was heard.

During the last two or three years not only Congress but the public at large have complained bitterly because a few lawyer had been employed by the Government and their salaries fixed at $18,000 a year.

The matter with which it is now my purpose to deal makes these salaries infinitesimal by comparison.

When the war was over a lot of surplus goods were sold, and some still are being sold. As a member of the Subcommittee on Appropriations which wrote the Army appropriation bill I heard a side remark in the committee room that an auctioneer had been paid a thousand dollars a day—or rather for 30 or 40 minutes of a day—for merely crying the sale of some Army goods. In answer to questions propounded to some of the officials I learned that not only had a thousand dollars a day been paid to auctioneers but that many thousands a day had been so paid. I then had the committee to ask the War Department for the names, post-office addresses, and the fees paid to the auctioneers who had cried these sales. In answer to that request the War Department furnished the list which I shall now discuss. The communication which accompanied the list was signed by the acting director of sales. That communication is divided into two paragraphs, numbered 1 and 2. Paragraph 1 related only to complying with the request to furnish the list. Paragraph 2 gave a reason for not furnishing a complete list. However, it may be deemed best to quote paragraph 2, which reads as follows:

Due to the necessity of submitting this report at this time, the Ordnance Department has been unable to furnish data relative to auctioneers employed by that department. The records on this subject at the various district ordnance offices have been boxed and stored; therefore there will be a delay in the submission of their report. As soon as it is received in this office it will be forwarded to your office promptly.

It developed that the plan of compensating the auctioneers was on the percentage basis, instead of by the day, week, month, or year. Just what the motive may have been for adopting the percentage plan is one of conjecture only. However, it can be safely stated that no more effective way of paying large fees could possibly have been devised.

The report which was furnished by the War Department, and to which I have just referred, discloses that M. Fox & Sons, of Baltimore, Md., were employed on 113 different days for merely crying auction sales. The testimony showed that the auctioneer did not pay for the advertising nor for any other expense incident to the sale. The compensation allowed the auctioneer in every instance was merely for saying, "How much am I offered for this piece of property?" then stating the offer or offers, and then saying, "Look out! All in! Once, twice, three times, and sold!" For those 113 days the auctioneer was paid the enormous sum of $230,370.72. For less than one-third of a year he was paid more than the President's salary for three years. To go more into detail, he was paid $2,038.67 for only a part of each of those 113 days. This auctioneer was paid at the rate of approximately three-quarters of a million dollars a year.

Gerth's Realty Experts, of New York, were employed as auctioneer for 18 days. Their compensation was $11,450.56 a day, making a total for the 18 days of $206,110.08. For each of those 18 days the auctioneer received only a little less than the annual salary of a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for the 18 days he received nearly enough to pay the annual salaries of the nine members of the Supreme Court for nearly two years. And for each and every one of those days he received nearly as much as is paid to a Cabinet officer for a whole year.

Gordon & Williams, of Chicago, Ill., were employed as auctioneer for 16 days. For those 16 days they were paid $42,289.79, an average of $2,643.11 for each day. Congress will discuss for hours the propriety of adding $143 to the salary of a Government clerk who already is receiving $2,500 per year, but we find that in this case the auctioneer was paid more than such a salary for a comparatively short portion of one day's work without a word of protest.

The Louisville Real Estate & Development Co., of Louisville, Ky., was employed one day as auctioneer. For that one day that concern was paid $24,194.80, which amount would almost pay the salary of the collector of internal revenue at Louisville for four years. If the collector had been paid on the same basis, his compensation while the whisky tax was being collected would have amounted to $200,000 a day, or $7,300,000 a year. If one is paid on the percentage plan, why not the other? The amount received by this auctioneer for one day's services would not fall far short of paying the salary of the governor of my native State for four years.

J. Hall Miller, an auctioneer, of Atlanta, Ga., was employed for 30 days, for which he was paid $37,209.44, a daily average of $1,240.31. At that rate his compensation for a year would have been $439,593.15. His compensation for one month was more than sufficient to pay the salaries of three Cabinet officers for 12 months.

Arthur C. Sheridan, an auctioneer, of New York City, was employed for one day, for which he received $4,603.20. At that rate his compensation for a year would have been $1,680,168.

Smith & Jaffe, auctioneers, of New York City, were employed for 39 days, for which they were paid $73,719.28, a daily average of $1,890.24. The amount paid that firm for 39 days would very nearly pay the annual salaries of 10 United States Senators. At the rate of $1,890.24 per day the annual compensation would amount to $689,937.60.

A. T. Swepston, of Chillicothe, Ohio, was employed for 10 days, for which he was paid $24,889.50, a daily average of $2,488.95. At that rate his annual compensation would be $908,247.75.

Michael Tauber, of Chicago, Ill., was employed for 26 days, for which he was paid $60,600.50, a daily average of $2,330.78, at which rate his annual compensation would be $850,734.70.

Willmerding, Morris & Mitchell, of New York City, were employed for nine days as auctioneers, for which service they were paid $18,789.90, a daily average of $2,087.77; at which rate the annual compensation would be $762,089.05.

Samuel Wintermiltz, an auctioneer, of Chicago, Ill., was paid $59,995.48 for 13 days. His compensation averaged $4,615.03 a day. At that rate his annual compensation would amount to $1,684,485.95. The amount paid this man for 13 days would lack only $5 of paying six members of the Interstate Commerce Commission their annual salaries.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield? I did not hear the source of the gentleman's information. Was it from the War Department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; these figures are obtained from the War Department itself.

Mr. McSWAIN. I just wanted to be sure. I did not want to get my feelings wrought up by an Arabian Nights' tale.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Samuel T. Freeman, of Philadelphia, Pa., was employed for 64 days, for which he was paid $167,163.43, a daily average of $2,611.93. At that rate his annual compensation would be $953,354.45. The amount paid this man for 64 days would pay the salaries of the nine Cabinet officers for a year and in addition would lack but little of paying the annual salaries of six district Federal judges.

Atlantic Coast & Realty Co., of Petersburg, Va., was paid $2,870.18 for one day.

Auctioneer Newell D. Atwood, of Boston, Mass., was paid $1,189 for eight days.

Auctioneer W. L. Bennett, of Columbia, S. C., was paid $1,202.57 for four days.

Jacob Cash, of New York City, was paid $4,046.85 for one day. At that rate his compensation for a year would amount to $1,477,100.

P. L. Crouch, of Des Moines, Iowa, for 9 days was paid $17,962.74, a daily average of $1,984.98, at which rate his annual compensation would be $724,627.70.

Fay W. Danford, of Rochester, N. Y., was employed for three days, for which he received $13,585.88, a daily average of $4,528.62; at which rate his annual compensation would amount to $1,652,946.30.

Danford-Bless, of Buffalo, N. Y., was employed for two days, for which was paid $4,445.48, a daily average of $2,222.74.

Joseph P. Day, of New York City, was paid $3,723 for two days, a daily average of $1,861.50.

Isidoro D. Delgado, of San Juan, P. R., for six days received $567.64.

John J. Erwin, of Jersey City, N. J., for one day received $1,775.

Fitzpatrick Tell Auction Co., New Orleans, for three days received $1,321.23.

Abe Franklin (no address given) for four days received $247.43.

Alfred Freeman, of New York City, for nine days received $21,007.50.

Samuel T. Freeman, of Philadelphia, for 12 days was paid $28,470.21.

Leo Fresh, of Atlanta, Ga., was paid $1,136.85 for one day.

Julius Gollober, of San Francisco, Calif., was paid $8,143.04 for seven days.

Dan Greenberg, of Los Angeles, Calif., was paid $1,775.36 for one day.

Henry J. Healy, of Worcester, Mass., was paid $2,175 for 23 days.

Bryan Kennelly, of New York City, was paid $7,725.96 for two days, an average of $3,862.98 per day; at which rate his yearly compensation would have been $1,409,987.70.

Aleck Licatu (no address given) received $621.54 for seven days.

Thomas B. Lovatt, of Philadelphia, was paid $8,096.35 for seven days.

Joseph Rubin, of San Antonio, Tex., for 34 days received $34,389.11.

R. E. Swepston, of Chillicothe, Ohio, for one day was paid $2,488.95.

David B. Traxler, of Greenville, S. C., was paid $7,973.60 for five days.

Joseph P. Tupper, of Logan, Iowa, was paid $2,488.93 for one day.

A. A. Weschler, of Washington, D. C., was paid $153.82 for four days.

Fox, of Baltimore, was paid $13,650.45 on the 19th day of September, 1922, for crying a sale on that day.

Smith & Jaffe, 68 West Forty-fifth Street, New York City, were paid $28,102.26 for making a sale on August 16, 1921.

Gerth's Realty Experts, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York City, were paid $23,538.84 for sales made from the 16th to the 19th day of August, 1921; and for crying sales on the 10th to the 16th day of October, 1921, they were paid $56,030.82; and for crying sales on the 16th and 17th days of December, 1921, they were paid $45,407.52; and for crying a sale on December 7, 1922, they were paid $42,750. For the four sales just referred to that same firm was paid $167,747.73.

Early in my remarks I read the second paragraph of the letter of the War Department, in which it was stated that because many of the reports dealing with the sale of the surplus Army goods were filed away in boxes, the department was unable at that time to give me a complete list of the auctioneers and the commissions paid them.

The total compensation paid to auctioneers, as just recited by me, amounts to $1,187,097.83, of which amount 14.659 per cent was paid during the Woodrow Wilson administration and 85.34 per cent under the administrations of Presidents Harding and Coolidge.

Upon a former occasion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] called attention to another abuse about these auction sales.

Mr. MADDEN, in his statement, said:

I want to be distinctly understood as saying that the men in charge of the sales of war surplus supplies are in combination with men on the outside to whom an advantage is given, and that in no case, except an exceptional case, is anybody advised that war supplies are declared surplus except these men, who are given the inside.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to ask the gentleman who in the War Department authorized those payments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not that information.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does not the gentleman think we ought to have that information?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Nobody blames the auctioneer for taking it if somebody would let him have it. Somebody had to let him have it by a contract, and we ought to know about that.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? These sales took place under the direction of an officer known as the director of sales?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. He handled the whole matter and hired the auctioneers, I presume.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If you could use the word "hired"; yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. My recollection is—and pardon me if I make a statement—that when this matter came up in the Committee on Military Affairs way back yonder there were some of us who protested very strenuously against the necessity of this Government having to hire a director of sales to instruct the men to do the work who really had to do it; and, as a matter of fact, I have always felt that this director of sales was just simply an officer fastened onto this country unnecessarily.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. When was that officer of sales created?

Mr. McKENZIE. Way back in 1919, right after the war; and the first director of sales was in Philadelphia on a salary that was enormous.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hope from the remark made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Dickinson] that because the director of sales may have been authorized back in another administration, it is not the purpose of the present administration to reject all that is good in the former administration and accept all that is bad.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. May I say that these accounts had to be passed on by somebody under the administration?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would take that for granted.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They were passed on by the administration, and I presume approved by the Secretary of War or his duly accredited representatives, and whether the director of sales or some one else authorized it, it seems to me that the Secretary of War himself is responsible for the payments made.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not true that this system, which we must all condemn as being wasteful and extravagant, prevailed under both administrations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I just so stated.

Mr. ANTHONY. And was caused by the laxity of Congress in this case in authorizing the War Department to make these sales of surplus property and to consume 5 per cent of the total amount realized in the expense of selling?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not answer the gentleman's question, because I have not the information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman mean to say that Congress authorized a 5 per cent commission?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I am correct in stating that Congress authorized them to spend 5 per cent of the amount realized in the cost of selling, and in this bill we are undertaking to curb their advertising costs.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would like to have the gentleman present that authority; but even if it be true, that would not justify any public official who wanted to conserve the public money in spending these immense amounts the gentleman has referred to.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is stated in the hearings by the War Department officers that they are authorized to spend 5 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I trust that gentlemen will not take up too much of my time, because I have some other interesting details to which I wish to call attention.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, could the gentleman tell us how much additional information of the same kind may be stored away in those boxes which are referred to in the letter of the acting director of sales?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no idea.

Mr. KVALE. It might be very interesting to know.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I was unavoidably called from the Chamber and did not hear the first part of the gentleman's discussion, but I gather from the last part, and I want to know if I am correct, that these were not dollar-a-year men the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Some of them were a million and a half dollars a year, at least on that basis.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], the chairman of the subcommittee, pleads the helplessness of these directors of sales, that they had to go to the maximum authorized by law, and he lays the blame on Congress. I suppose that he hesitated to lay the blame on a Republican Congress which has been in session during nearly all of this period.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I may be in error about Congress having passed a law, but it is either an act of Congress or a regulation of the War Department; and if it was a regulation of the War Department, it is one that went into effect during a previous administration.

Mr. WINGO. Is it the policy of the War Department, when Congress fixes a limitation, that the responsible officers have no discretion and are compelled to go to the maximum of that limitation?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. It was testified, as I recall, at the hearings that these auctioneers were paid on a sliding scale.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; that was not so testified to. But a bad custom prevails here, and this is no exception to its evils. When one testifies before a committee he takes a transcript of his testimony for revision and extension. I heard all that was said.

As the gentleman from California well knows, relative to these auction sales, I was present. I have read what is in the printed hearings on the subject, and I can hardly recognize it as being the same subject, because what the witness testified to has been so extensively doctored. I have no doubt that it is quite true there is a sliding scale, but that 5 per cent is the maximum.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not asking that question or offering that information for the purpose of defending this policy—

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I know the gentleman does not defend it.

Mr. BARBOUR. Of paying these large fees, but it was merely to throw a possible light on the system itself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Many of these sales were through retail stores conducted by the War Department, where very reasonable salaries were paid, not exceeding $150 or $200 a month in the aggregate, and although that service extended over a year's time, it did not exceed or even equal the 5 per cent of the returns. Congress, of course, in fixing a maximum—

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I beg the gentleman's indulgence right there. I have come across nothing which indicates that Congress has fixed a maximum at all. It most probably has been fixed by regulation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If Congress fixed a 5 per cent maximum it, of course, had in mind the fact that the character of the service would be such as to entail long-time employment, and never for a moment did Congress, I am sure, have in mind an amount such as the gentleman has indicated would be paid for one day's mere crying off of articles to be sold, amounting to some two or three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman heard what I said in the beginning of my remarks, he will know that it comes to approximately $25,000 for some days and nearly $50,000 for other days.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Is this employment by the day or is it contract work? How are these particular auctioneers selected in the various localities?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no real information as to the latter part of the gentleman's question, but I take it for granted that the director of sales, as a matter of course, selected the auctioneers.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has given a great deal of data. Could not the gentleman have ascertained in the hearings the manner in which these selections were made; that is, the names of the auctioneers and the procedure under which these sales were made, and by whom? Could he not have gotten the information?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman seems to overlook very many things in a very large piece of work that have been done, singling out just one piece that has not been done, which he himself might do just as readily as anybody else.

As I was about to say a few moments ago, there is another feature connected with these auction sales that is worthy of the most serious consideration. I obtained the impression in the committee that three men were concerned, but since that time in talking with the clerk of the committee I have reached the conclusion that a larger number, say, some six or eight men, were selected to place the advertisement of the auction sales in the newspapers of the Nation.

It seems that they were not asked to place these advertisements in the newspapers to the best advantage of the Government. I put in, "to the best advantage of the Government" advisedly. These few men, whatever the exact number may be, were brought in and told to go and place the advertisements in the newspapers of the United States. They were told that the Government would not pay them for so doing, but when they went to place them that they should tell the publishers that they—the publishers—are to pay 10 per cent, that being the first figure named; but the report received since then shows that they did receive for placing these advertisements, 8 per cent, 9 per cent, and 10 per cent. For doing that which the newspapers would have gone to the War Department and sought these men were paid approximately $57,000. If these newspapers, in my humble judgment, could have gotten these advertisements directly they would have been willing to rebate to the United States Government the sum of $57,000 that they paid to these men who did place them. Let us look a little further into this subject. I have examined, and I will say to the gentleman who has just propounded a question as to why I did not ascertain more, that I have examined approximately 50 newspapers to find the advertisements of the auction sales of Government property.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the first one. I am hesitating because I am having difficulty in finding from the ad where the sale is to be. Here it is. The sale is to be at Symington, Chicago. You see the difficulty I am having to find out from the ad where it is to be. The first part of the advertisement reads this way:

On December 7 at 2.30 p. m., the War Department will offer at auction all the land and buildings comprising the Symington Gun Plant.

My eye did not fall on that at first, or I would have found it more quickly than I did. Now, that gives the month, the day of the month, and the hour of the day, and it further says that the auction will take place on the premises.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What year?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. November 25, 1922. Now, out of a number of newspaper advertisements I found this to be the only one which states where the auction sale is to be and at what hour it is to be held.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Did the gentleman state the paper in which that advertisement appeared—what is the name of the publication?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The Electric Railway Journal.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But this was an advertisement in some paper paid for by the Government?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, yes. I wish to repeat that out of all the Government auction sales that advertisement is the only one that I came across that states the place where the sale is to be and the hour at which it is to be held. Here, in another paper, is the ad of a sale out at Chicago for May 17, 1923. This is an advertisement of 13,630 sets of harness, various; 2,097 saddles; 23,494 bridles; 6,055 surcingles; 2,877 buckets, watering, canvas; 14,670 bags, feed, grain, supply; and other things in proportionate number. Suppose you or I wished to attend that auction sale which was then to be held in Chicago; where would we go, and at what hour would we go?

Mr. SPEAKS. Is there any record of the proceeds of that sale?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not them separately. Just in that connection allow me to invite your attention to the ad of two Government sales to be held in Los Angeles. One is an auction sale of United States Government property and the other is an auction sale of a merchant of Los Angeles, advertising that on a certain day he would dispose of $75,000 worth of goods at auction. Now, let us see the difference between the two ads. The advertisement of the sale of Government property does not say where the sale will be or the hour at which it will be. Then let us take that of the business man. It reads as follows:

Auction. Close-out sale of Buttress & McClellan's entire stock of machinery, valued at $75,000, to be sold Wednesday, April 25, at 9.30 a. m., 211 Alpine Street, Los Angeles.

At the bottom of that advertisement, after some intervening matter, it says this:

Do not miss it! How to get there: Go north on Broadway to Alpine Street, two blocks north of Sunset Boulevard. Turn east one-half block.

Will somebody tell me why there was not some such business method interjected into the sale of Government property so that a man could find the place of sale.

Here is an ad of a big sale at Brooklyn, May 24, 2,290 ponchos, various; 466 pairs shoes, field, 94 to 14, B to EE; 56,050 bags cotton, white; 77,765 bags, kit; 4,192 belts; and a whole lot of other stuff. Now, that is advertised to be sold in Brooklyn on a specified day, but when a man goes to Brooklyn and wants to attend a sale, where is he to find out the hour the sale is to take place and where in Brooklyn.

Mr. STENGLE. I want to interject in there that Brooklyn occupies 81 square miles.

Mr. McSWAIN. And has how large a population?

Mr. STENGLE. Two million one hundred and fifty thousand people; how easy (?) it is to find your way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Next, here is the ad of a sale advertisement in Chicago to be held May 17, 1923:

Chicago auction, May 17; 2,877 buckets, watering, canvas; 14,670 bags, feed, grain, supply; 17,710 straps for saddlebags; 29,207 pieces of leather, strap, russet; and various other things in like proportion.

Now, that sale is advertised to be in Chicago on May 17. How could I or any of you, or even anybody living in Chicago, know where to go in order to attend that sale? How could anyone know where to go, as neither the place of sale nor the hour was given in the ad?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask my friend whether he has been able to ascertain who were the purchasers at these "blind auctions"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I have not been able to. But I have a very interesting picture here in another ad. If you gentlemen will pardon me a minute I will find it. I will find these things as rapidly as I can among my papers. One of these advertisements contains a picture of an auction sale, and it is worth looking at. Now I have it. Up here on the auctioneer's stand is a man with a cane in his hand, pointing to No. 103, indicating that lot No. 103 is being sold. By his side stands an auctioneer, crying the sale. The picture shows that there were 25 or 30 people present. Others, probably, could not find their way there. But we see one man standing up with a piece of paper in his hand, attracting the attention of the auctioneer, presumably to make a bid. It looks like a one-man sale.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Who prepared these notices of the sale?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The people who got the $57,000 that I have just been talking about.

Now, gentlemen, if I may go back just a little: In committee, the director of sales was asked what duties the auctioneer had to perform besides that of crying the sale and what expense he had. One instance of expense, he said, was that in some instances the auctioneer provided some sale catalogues for distribution. But, later along in his remarks, it comes out that while the auctioneer may have advanced the money for the catalogues, when the money was collected for the sale the cost of the catalogues was taken out, and at last the Government had to pay it. Then I asked the witness, or at least he volunteered—but it is put in here as coming by a question from me—"Does the auctioneer ever have a bond?" I never asked such a question as that. The witness volunteered it.

I never supposed for a minute that the auctioneer was required to give bond, because at the end of all these advertisements the "Government reserves the right to reject any and all bids." I do not know whether any were rejected or not, as that would interfere with the auctioneer's compensation; but the excuse for the bond was that the auctioneer might fraudulently knock off a sale too quickly to somebody. In another advertisement they say they want to give bargains; that they do not want a purchaser to pay too much; in substance, that they do not want to glut the market with any particular kind of goods.

Those goods were bought with money taken from people in the way of taxation. But the people were denied the right, and intentionally denied the right, to get back any part of it by making purchases at auction in small quantities, as they were compelled to buy in too large quantities or not buy at all.

I have a lot of these newspaper advertisements here, and none of them, except one, gives the hour of sale and the place of sale. I will leave these out on the table, and if any Member wants to look at them, he may do so.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman tell us how this committee of three or five was constituted or appointed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I understand the director of sales delegated that authority to them.

Mr. RAKER. Were they connected with the Government in any way?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not.

Mr. RAKER. They were citizens?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Apparently they were selected just to stand back and catch the $57,000 among themselves.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman if in his investigation he found any evidence that from this kind of advertising and having the ability of this wonderful (?) director of sales the War Department was helped to sell these goods? Did the Government get a better price for the stuff sold than it would have gotten ordinarily? Have you any evidence of that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I have not. But a few days ago one of the most reliable men in this city was talking to me, and he told me that just a few days before, week before last, some Army office furniture was sold down here at Potomac Park at public auction. He said there were some 30 office tables to be sold. He inquired into the subject and found that these tables had cost the Government about $30 apiece. He tried to buy one, but could not, and they put up the 30 and sold them at $1.10 apiece. I suppose that answers the gentleman's question, so far as my real knowledge and information of the subject goes.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. THATCHER. Were all these commissions paid out of the proceeds of the sale or by an appropriation by Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is my understanding that the commissions were paid out of the proceeds of sales.

Mr. THATCHER. There has been no legislation in Congress about it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly no recent legislation.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Have you ascertained if there is still on hand any amount of surplus property, so that we may lock the stable door against some colts before they all escape?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. The director of sales told the committee that by the end of June next these sales would all be completed, but he asked for, and receives in this bill, a large amount of money with which to pay clerks for the ensuing fiscal year, when there will be no sales. I must admit that I did not detect that until I read the hearings this morning, and I am sure that no other member of the committee did, else that item would not be in the bill. I want to say that so far as I know—and I think I know—every member of the committee views this whole subject just as I do, and I hope my views are not misunderstood.

There are just a few other matters that I wish to take up.

When the subcommittee reported the bill to the whole committee the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], in a facetious spirit, of course, in complimenting the different members of the subcommittee for the diligent work they had done, complimented me for having called attention to the low price of mules. The purchase of a number of them is provided for in this bill. It is true that mules have gone down and down in value. There are many causes for it; but, perhaps, there is one that did not occur to the gentleman from Kansas, and that is that, according to common rumor, elephants have become so confounded cheap that they can be bought cheaper than mules and can do more work than a whole field of mules.

The gentleman from Kansas has referred to the building of a barracks at Fort Benning, Ga. Three hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars is appropriated in this bill for beginning the construction of a barracks at that place which will cost $1,500,000 when completed.

The expert testimony before the committee was to this effect: That if all of the buildings were authorized now, to be let in one contract, instead of letting the work a piece this year, a piece next year, and a piece the next year, that $250,000 could be saved. A quarter of a million dollars could be saved, according to the expert testimony before the committee, if this contract were let all at once. You can see the reasons. If a man gets a contract for building the $385,000 part of it, has his machinery, his hands, and everything else, then fails to get the next contract on competitive bidding, he must move his plant away and another man must move his in; so you can readily see that whoever gets the contract can build the whole thing cheaper than if he were uncertain as to what extent he would be given a future contract.

Next, great economy has been exercised during the last few years on appropriation bills. For that the chairmen of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADSEN], is to be commended; but the first question which arises is: Has he not cut into the very bone? I insist that there are numerous places in this bill, and in the ones which have preceded it, where economy has been practiced to such an extent that every time a dollar has been saved $100 and maybe more have been lost.

For instance: There is a railroad running from Fort Bragg to the next town. Everything which goes into that fort must be hauled over that railroad. Appropriations have not been made to keep it up until now a railroad engine or a railroad car can not go over a great portion of that road. The train goes up to the dangerous point, and there the supplies are unloaded and hauled by truck to the camp. That has been remedied in this bill, but it should have been remedied before. So, where dollars were saved in refusing to keep that railroad in proper conditions hundreds of dollars have been lost in hauling—loss in wear and tear of trucks, and damage to the highway.

Next, in this Government of ours there is a monstrous system of duplication. Take the Intelligence Bureau, for instance. One of the witnesses who appeared before the committee told of the enormous work that bureau was doing, what they were getting out, and the demand for their work. One of their alleged great pieces of work was that they were furnishing war maps to the Army and maps to Members of Congress for distribution; but at last there leaked out the fact that these maps were suggested to members. They were told that the maps were available and, consequently, Members of Congress availed themselves of the opportunity to get them and send them out. But, when witnesses from other departments of the Government came before the committee, those for whom this Intelligence Bureau was pretending to make war maps, they said they were making their own war maps. Then, when we reached the question as to whether the Intelligence Bureau was making maps and furnishing them to Members of Congress and various people throughout the United States, it was found that they were making comparatively only a few maps, and that they were borrowing maps from the other departments of the Government and sending them out to Members of Congress. There is a clear case of duplication of work.

Then, while it does not appear in this bill—but I came across it a year ago and spoke of it then—we have the Department of Commerce, that gets financial reports and agricultural reports from every part of the world. They distribute our agricultural reports to every part of the world.

Then there is the Pan American Congress, which is as big a fraud as was ever put upon the American people. That was gotten up by a man whom many of you know, a smart fellow, who rose from bellboy to a great, big man because he had wonderful ability. But that scheme of the Pan American Building down here was gotten up in order for one man to make a fine position for himself. He has lost it, but another man has it, and it is the purest and simplest sinecure in the world.

They, under the terms of the agreement between this Nation and the South American nations, receive certain amounts of money, contributed by each nation. We are paying many, many times more than our agreed share. Some of the South American nations are paying nothing, yet these salaries go on. Then, with the money that was taken from the taxpayers of the United States to pay not only its part, and more than its part, for the support of the Pan American Building, the lives of the people employed down there were insured and paid for out of public money. The very reports which the Pan American Building distributes are distributed from the Agricultural Department, and can be gotten for anybody just as effectively and conveniently if there was no such thing as the Pan American Congress.

I realize how much time I have taken; and in order that others may have some time I shall not address the House further, but hope to do so when we go into the bill, section by section. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has consumed one hour.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Kentucky want to use further time now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I prefer that the gentleman from Iowa use some time on his own side.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I just want to take a few moments' time in calling attention to one or two matters that impressed themselves upon me during the hearings on this bill.

In examining into the various items which go to make up the river and harbor appropriation it was found that as to some of the projects the local communities cooperate in bearing the expense of those projects, in some instances to a considerable extent. This is true of many of the later projects which have been authorized and in connection with which local cooperation has been required. It is the rule on the Pacific coast for ports to cooperate in paying the cost of harbor-improvement work, as a general rule about 50 per cent of the cost of such improvement being contributed by the localities benefited thereby. Cooperation is required in the work of flood control on the Mississippi River, the local communities being required to pay one-third of the cost, and in many instances the localities contributed as high as 50 per cent of the expense. The attitude of the War Department is that the local communities should cooperate to the fullest extent possible. This, in my opinion, should be the rule in connection with local harbor improvements. Every improvement confers a certain benefit on the town to which the channel leads or the harbor is adjacent. I am not speaking of through channels but those which lead to a certain harbor or city, in which case the city does derive direct benefit.

But the Federal Government is now carrying on projects, many of which were authorized in the past and in connection with which no local cooperation is required, the expense being paid entirely by the Federal Government, while the benefits are almost wholly local. The usefulness of many of these projects is rapidly diminishing, the necessity for them being supplanted by motor trucks and other means of conveyance which have superseded water transportation in these localities.

Reference to a few of these projects will illustrate the point that I am making.

In one the entire tonnage for the year 1922 consisted of 2,202 tons, comprising mostly oysters, clams, fruits, and vegetables. This traffic is practically all local. The estimates for the next fiscal year call for $5,000 for maintenance. The only cooperation required in connection with this project was the building of a drawbridge. The estimate for 1925 shows a cost to the Federal Government of more than $2 per ton for every ton of freight handled.

Another project bore a tonnage in 1922 of 40,047 tons. Maintenance estimated for 1925 is $45,000, with an annual estimate of $3,000 for future maintenance. Commerce consisted of lumber, petroleum products, and general merchandise, and was practically local. No local cooperation has been required.

Another project furnishes entrance to a certain resort city on the Atlantic coast. The 1922 tonnage was 4,054, although it is estimated that 300,000 passengers arrived by water. The 1925 estimate for this improvement is $148,000, and local cooperation has consisted of experimental work with a view to deepening the harbor and improvements in the inner harbor.

There is another project, which handled in 1922 2,597 tons. The estimates for the next fiscal year are $45,000 for improvement work and $10,000 for maintenance. Maintenance alone for the fiscal year 1925 will cost almost $4 per ton of traffic handled. The only local cooperation required has been the furnishing of title to certain lands used for cut-offs. There is no direct railroad connection with this project, and the traffic handled is largely of a local nature.

Another shows that 872 tons were handled in 1922. The estimate for 1925 calls for $5,000 for maintenance. The only local cooperation has been that certain private parties have dredged some channels. This project affords a waterway from certain small towns to some larger cities. The commerce handled consists of oysters, clams, and fish. It is estimated that the Federal Government will spend $5.73 in 1925 for every ton of freight transported, based on the records of 1922.

I have cited but a few instances to show a condition that exists. There are others of a similar nature. Many of these projects have been in existence for a considerable period of years. No local cooperation was originally required. The project having been authorized and appropriated for and the work begun, there is nothing for the War Department to do but to carry it on.

If Congress would adopt a policy and lay down a rule that not only every new project of a local nature but those heretofore authorized which confer principally local benefits should require local cooperation, it would result in a large saving to the Government and at the same time would do as much as anything else to refute the charge of "pork-barrel legislation" so frequently made against river and harbor appropriations.

No matter what the custom has been in the past, the Federal Government should not be required to maintain at its expense works which contribute principally to the benefit of some particular locality. If local cooperation is required in such great harbor improvements as those at Los Angeles and other great seaports, then there is all the more reason for requiring local cooperation in connection with works which are principally of local benefit.

In preparing the estimates for the present bill the Secretary of War and the officers of the Army and War Department, who have this work in charge, have shown a commendable spirit of cooperation with the committee and the Budget officers. They have been of real assistance in preparing and bringing out a bill that has for its purpose the preservation of the national safety and security and at the same time is in line with the avowed policy of economy in governmental expenditures.

It may be that some of the activities of the Army have not been given as much as those in charge believed they should have for their fullest development. The desire of officers of the Army to carry on to the fullest extent possible in their particular lines of activity is to be commended. Yet, notwithstanding that desire, there has been throughout the preparation of this bill an apparent realization of the need for economy and of the fact that the Budget system, which is aimed to secure the economical administration of the Government's business, has become a part of our Government system and places a responsibility upon administrative officials as well as upon Congress.

I would commend the spirit of cooperation shown by the officers of the War Department in connection with this bill to other administrative officers of the Government who have fallen into the habit of criticizing Congress through the newspapers and in speeches, and to those officials of our executive departments and bureaus who write letters, in reply to communications received, that owing to insufficient appropriations by Congress certain activities of the Government have had to be curtailed. There is, in my opinion, altogether too much of a desire on the part of certain administrative officials to criticize Congress. It may be that the appropriation, or lack of appropriation, complained of was based upon the best judgment of the Bureau of the Budget after a thorough investigation of the subject and concurred in by the committee and Congress after further investigation, and that Congress has only carried out the spirit and intent of the Budget act. The Budget act has met with the approval of the people as has no other act of Congress in recent years. It has become an established part of our governmental policy. It will be useful only to the extent that Congress and the administrative branches of the Government are guided by its purpose and intent. Instead of criticism of Congress by administrative officers on account of appropriations, there should be whole-hearted cooperation to the end that there should be no waste or extravagance in governmental expenditures. It is possible for mistakes to be made and that certain items and appropriations for certain activities will be underestimated rather than overestimated. The Bureau of the Budget may not always be right, and Congress is not infallible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. BARBOUR. If mistakes do occur it is the duty of the officer in charge of the particularly activity affected to inform the proper persons in authority, rather than through newspaper interviews and banquet speeches to pose as patriots who would save the Nation from destruction at the hands of Congress. What is needed is real wholehearted cooperation between the officials of the executive departments and Congress in carrying out the spirit and intent of the Budget act.

I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SNYDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

S. 2686. An act to authorize the Federal Power Commission to amend permit No. 1, project No. 1, issued to the Dixie Power Co.;

S. 1530. An act providing for the marking with an enduring monument the site of Charles Fort, S. C.; and

S. 2821. An act to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National McKinley Birthplace Memorial Association," approved March 4, 1911.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 2113. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton; and

S. 1982. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., its successors and assigns, of a line of railroad across the northeasterly portion of the Fort Snelling Military Reservation in the State of Minnesota.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is my intention to consume but a very small portion of the time which has been allotted to me. I have asked for this time in order to present for the Record, by way of extension, some of the reasons which induced me to vote against the so-called adjusted compensation measure when it passed the House several days ago. That bill—which has been misnamed an adjusted compensation measure, but which was really an insurance bill, with the exception of the $50 and less that is to be paid in cash to those who under its provisions are not entitled to a greater amount—passed by a big vote in this House under a motion to suspend the rules, which cut off all amendments and which denied the privilege of debate to Members except for 20 minutes to a side. It was passed under circumstances which were pronounced at the time to be a parliamentary outrage. It was a bill which its sponsors declared would cost the Treasury more than $2,000,000,000, and it was presented here by 13 members of the Ways and Means Committee. Members of the House were asked to vote for it without the privilege of amending it or even expressing their views. And after its passage the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. BIGGS), assuming leadership, saw fit—and has repeatedly since seen fit—by an objection which evidences neither statesmanship nor ordinary courtesy to his colleagues to deny to Members the privilege of extending their remarks in the Record showing why they were either for or against that measure.

Never in all my experience as a Member of this House have I ever known of any Member on either side of the Chamber being guilty of such discourtesy to his colleagues and such very great unfairness to the membership. Knowing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRAD] as I do, I am constrained to believe that he did it under the impelling insistence of leaders upon the Republican side, who were unwilling themselves to resort to any discourtesy or any such evidence of unfairness to the Members, and put upon him that burden.

I do not know just why the gentleman has objected to Members extending their remarks in the Record, their own remarks, unless it be that he or those for whom he is acting are unwilling for the Record to show the circumstances under which that bill was passed and the methods used in putting it through.

I have served in this House for 15 years. I had the privilege of serving as a Member of the House when that remarkable and grand old man, Uncle Joe Cannon, was Speaker of the House. I served in the House during the time when it was dominated and controlled by a Committee on Rules, and when newspapers throughout the country claimed that the House was laboring under and was controlled by gag rule, but never in my experience have I known a situation where one Member of the House, who, much as I respect him, I do not put in the class of those statesmen, has assumed upon his own prerogative as a Member to apply the gag rule and prevent 434 other Members from exercising the right of free speech and the mere privilege of extending in the Record an explanation of the vote which they cast.

Gentlemen, was it fair? Was it courteous? Was it what you would have done or what any other Member would have done? The gentleman from Ohio is the most shining example I have known of a Member who is willing to put the gag upon his colleagues and refuse to permit free Representatives upon this floor to exercise their rights, and who is willing to use the rules in order to inflict gag rule upon the membership of this House, and to deny to the people the right of the fullest information as to what their Representatives are doing. By so doing he has certainly not gained the admiration of the membership on either side of the Chamber, or raised himself in the estimation of his own constituents, who, I assume, favor free speech.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman realize that the gentleman from Ohio is what is called the substitute whip and was acting in a semi, if not a full, official capacity in making that objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have just said that knowing the gentleman from Ohio as I do, and respecting him as I do, I am constrained out of charity to believe that he did it at the instance—I will not say at the order—of the real leaders upon his side of the Chamber.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. I can not agree with the gentleman about that. I do not believe the gentleman was acting upon the suggestion of anybody but himself. I know a great many men on our side who desired to extend their remarks, and while I do not claim to be one of those who is near to the leaders, yet I heard no such suggestion on the part of anyone, except the man himself.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure that the gentleman from New York, whose great fairness and whose courtesy I admire, would not have objected. I am quite sure that the overwhelming majority upon that side of the Chamber would not have objected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further for another question? I want to say that I was prompted in asking my question by my friendship for the gentleman from Ohio, and I was trying to give him an excuse so he could escape the odium which might have attached if he had done this on his own responsibility. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Has not that same thing been done on the gentleman's side of the House in the past quite frequently?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Can the gentleman cite an instance?

Mr. HARDY. I do not need to mention any name, but I do know of men who object to things of this kind. Have we not had men on either side who would object to things of that kind?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We have now and then instances of Members objecting to extension of remarks—

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me that it was not such an extraordinary thing in this House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman let me complete my answer to his question? We have now and then instances of gentlemen upon either side of the Chamber objecting to an extension of remarks, assigning good reasons therefor at the time, and no question is made of their rights and no criticism offered, but this is the first time—and I dare say the gentleman will say it is the first time—he has ever known any Member of this House to deny every other Member of this House the right to express themselves through the Record and to give an honest explanation of the action which they took upon any bill pending here, especially when they were denied the privilege of doing so in regular debate. Does the gentleman think that comports with fairness? Does the gentleman approve of it?

Mr. HARDY. Whether I approve of it or not, I did not ask for an extension of remarks, nor have I ever objected to any, but I remember a good many times when, from that side of the House, the same sort of objections have come.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Never, never. There have been individual objections, and there will continue to be individual objections, but never a blanket objection where a gentleman stands upon his feet and, taking advantage of the rules, undertakes to say that no man, although he be a Representative upon this floor, shall have the privilege of inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an explanation of his vote upon any bill pending here. There have been objections to the extension of extraneous remarks, remarks made by others, and editorials, but so far as I know I do not now recall any Member who has ever objected to a colleague extending his own remarks, especially when he wanted to do it in explanation of some action that he had taken and when he had been denied an opportunity to discuss it when the proposition was before the House, and that is the complaint I make.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to say that I tried to get an arrangement whereby everybody could extend their remarks in the Record.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, yes. I hope that neither the gentleman from New York nor any other Member will think that I am personal in this, because I know that not only the gentleman from New York, who is always eminently fair, but also the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GARDNER], who is the chairman of the committee and who brought in the bill, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], ranking Democratic member of the committee, sought to obtain unanimous consent for every Member to extend his remarks for five legislative days. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRAD] was the only gentleman on the floor who rose to his feet and made objection. That is my criticism. There is nothing personal to me in the matter. I have the opportunity to extend my remarks, and I propose to do so in connection with those that I am now making; but I insist that every Member whether he voted for or against the bill, no matter whom or where he comes from, should have a chance to extend his own remarks in the Record, and no Member, although he may have the power under the rules to do so, ought to deny his colleagues that opportunity and that privilege. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. Why not object henceforth to the extension of any remarks, to the granting of these concessions at all until that objection is withdrawn?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, so far as I am concerned, I do not recall that ever in the history of my legislative experience of 15 years have I objected to any request made by Representatives on either side of the Chamber to extend their remarks in the Record and, regardless of what the gentleman from Ohio or others may do, I do not propose to make any objection in the future.

Mr. YOUNG. Does not the gentleman believe that whenever that request is granted then from the point where the extension begins it ought to show in the Record, so that anyone reading the Record will know just what occurred on the floor?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the rules of the House, as the gentleman should know, provide now that remarks extended in the Record, unless delivered upon the floor, shall appear in the back of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the Appendix, as an extension of their remarks.

Mr. YOUNG. But the gentleman knows that a great many of these extensions do now appear as though regularly delivered on the floor.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would say to the gentleman that under the new rule adopted no remarks which are actually extension remarks, and which are not a part of remarks made upon the floor, can appear except as an extension in the Appendix of the Record.

Mr. YOUNG. In the interest of an accurate record I think that wherever an extension is made, when it is partly delivered on the floor and partly extended, the part that is extended ought to be clearly indicated in some way, so that we will know just what the proceedings on the floor are.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be true; but the point of my objection is that Members are denied any opportunity to extend their remarks. They were first denied the right of debate upon the over $2,000,000,000 bill, and then they were denied the right to place in the Record an explanation of their position on the bill.

I submit for the Record, under the leave granted, the statement to which I have referred, which, because the privilege of debate was denied, I had hoped to have printed at the time the bill was under consideration.

It is proposed to pass the bill reported by 13 members of the Ways and Means Committee and providing very meager insurance for the ex-service men instead of adjusted compensation in cash as desired by many of the veterans under a suspension of the rules which cuts off all possibility of amendments and limits the debate to 20 minutes on a side. Since no opportunity will be afforded to discuss the measure before the House, I have asked leave to extend my remarks in order to express briefly my views upon the pending measure. The House is supposed to be a representative body and it is a reflection upon its fairness and the political courage of its Members that the Republican leaders should insist upon passing this measure which it is conceded will ultimately cost the people more than two billions of dollars under a gag motion which cuts off the privilege of debate and denies to the Members the opportunity to offer amendments.

In other words the House is asked to accept the measure which has been reported by 13 Members without opportunity on the part of the other 422 Members to have a voice.

In the last few days in the course of debate on other measures this bill has been denounced on the floor by ex-service Members of Congress, among them the gentleman from Tennessee, Captain BROWNING, the gentleman from North Carolina, Major BULWINKLE, the gentleman from Alabama, Major JEFFREYS, the gentleman from Mississippi, Captain RANKIN, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAWES, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CONNERY, and others, some of whom rendered distinguished service overseas in the World War; as "an abortion under the guise of adjusted compensation"; "a joke which is being sent out and called a bonus bill"; "an insult to the intelligence of every service man in the United States"; "a political subterfuge"; "a cheap and disappointing gold brick"; "a tombstone bill"; "infamous subterfuge," and "a sham"; One distinguished overseas veteran declared: "The bill is wrong, it is absolutely wrong." It is difficult for me under such circumstances to see how anyone can vote for this bill.

No ex-service Member has arisen in his place to defend it or to call in question the terms which have been applied to it. If the motion to suspend the rules is voted down, then the bill will go upon the calendar and can be taken up very quickly through the method provided by the new rules of the House, and every Member will then have an opportunity to discuss it and to offer such amendments for cash options, with methods of securing the necessary revenue as he feels will more nearly meet the wishes of those who favor a bona fide adjusted compensation measure. This would preserve the dignity and importance of the House as a representative body and prevent its being placed before the country in the light of being without the courage to meet the real issue. It has been whispered around that the House can pass it in this form and depend upon the Senate to amend it. I submit that this is a position which no Member of the House should take, and is a reflection upon the political courage of the Member who votes for this measure with such a reservation. What would you think of a doctor who gave to his sick patient a medicine which he knew in advance would be unsatisfactory and would afford no relief with the hope that some other doctor later on would administer a medicine which would cure him?

The objections to the pending measure were summed up by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hawes], as follows:

First, it will disappoint and anger 90 per cent of the ex-service men and women; second, it will cost more than the cash plan; third, it will create another bureau at enormous expense with thousands of employees and prepare the way for premature pensions which will add annually billions of dollars to the burden of taxpayers; fourth, it will not settle this question, but will open up a new controversy and start new discussions which will arise with continued and greater vehemence; fifth, it will crowd banks and trust companies with loans, raise the rate of interest, and withdraw from investment capital badly needed for expansion, building, farming, and trading; sixth, it will start endless discussion and disputes about the rate of interest charged by various banking institutions and create discord, uncertainty, and trouble; seventh, it will throw the whole matter back into politics to become a football to be tossed back and forth for partisan political purposes.

I agree with him that it is time we stopped "playing politics" with this serious subject and that it should be settled now.

It is generally conceded that by eliminating the commissioned officers and providing only for the noncommissioned officers and privates a cash bonus could be provided for possibly $1,000,000,000. If a bonus is to be granted a cash option should be given and the service man not required to wait for 20 years or until he is dead in order to receive the small sum provided for in this bill. It is stated that under this bill 1,000,000 of the ex-service men will receive an insurance certificate of about $170 or less. Such a cash option should be accompanied also by proper methods of raising the revenue so as to provide that it should be paid by those who profited as the result of the war and not by those who not only received no profits during the war but who suffered thereby, and by the soldiers themselves.

Under this measure those who were drafted at the close of the war and who are entitled to less than $50 will receive their payments in cash while those who rendered longer service, and who suffered and sacrificed in the shock of battle overseas will be given a certificate payable at the end of 20 years or at their death. It is stated by the committee that the average amount of this certificate will be $962. A veteran whose length of service under the terms of this bill entitles him to receive $400 will receive in lieu thereof a certificate of something less than $1,000 which must be held for 20 years or until his death. At the end of two years he will be generously permitted to borrow thereon $57.30. At the end of the third year he can borrow about $30 more; at the end of the fourth year about $32 and at the end of the fifth year about $34 and so on provided some bank can be found which will loan it to him. And under the terms of the bill he must pay that bank 2 per cent interest in excess of the prevailing rate in the Federal reserve district for the discount of commercial paper. If he fails to pay the note at maturity, then the bank may send his note to Washington for payment. If subsequently he wishes to redeem his certificate from the Government he must pay to the Government 6 per cent interest on the sum so paid compounded annually.

What is to be thought of the provision providing that our Government shall charge these ex-service men who need these little sums to meet current expenses 6 per cent interest compounded which they must pay in order to redeem their certificates when the Government can borrow its money at 4 per cent? This is a rate of interest which is greater than that allowed under the law in Tennessee and most of the other States of the Union.

Let me say again that the man who is entitled to less than $50 will receive his pay in cash, but the man who is entitled, say, to $160 will receive an insurance certificate. He can not borrow anything on this certificate for two years and then he can borrow only about $14. Can anyone doubt but that he would rather have the $50 that is coming to the other fellow than the $160 that is coming to him if he has to take it in a policy?

I regard this measure as infinitely worse than the bill which was passed two years ago and which was vetoed by President Harding and which provided a form of deferred compensation and loan to the extent of 50 per cent of the service amount of the certificate. Having voted against that measure for reasons which I expressed at the time, I would not be true to my convictions but would stultify myself should I vote for this measure which has been prepared by 13 members of the Ways and Means Committee and for which the House is asked to vote without opportunity for debate or amendment. This bill is a fraud and a sham which is sought to be put over to meet a political exigency, and if it becomes a law it will be universally condemned by those in whose interest it is said to be drawn.

This bill was prepared behind closed doors in the Committee on Ways and Means and with the utmost secrecy and with no opportunity for the Members of Congress, the ex-service men, or the people to learn of its provisions until two days before it was to be taken up and passed in the manner above set forth. I am driven to the conclusion that this was done because it was known that if its provisions became public there would be a flood of protests on the part of the ex-service men themselves.

In conclusion let me say that I have always in committee and in the House consistently voted for the most liberal appropriations which those in charge said were necessary for the proper hospitalization, vocational training, and compensation for the disabled soldier, and will continue to do so. I believe that the provisions of the war risk act should be made more liberal so as to provide hospitalization, medical care, and treatment for those suffering disability and who are now adjudged not to come within its provisions. Some time ago I introduced a bill to that effect, a copy of which is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4887) providing for hospitalization, medical treatment, nursing, and all necessary care of honorably discharged disabled ex-service men.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director of the Veterans' Bureau be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide hospitalization, medical treatment, nursing, and all necessary care for honorably discharged members of the military or naval forces of the United States who served in the World War who are disabled or who may hereafter become disabled, regardless of the origin of said disability.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted that such hospitalization, medical treatment, nursing, and necessary care shall be furnished upon application and the presentation of a certificate from a reputable practicing physician certifying that such hospitalization, medical treatment, and nursing is necessary; and when hospitalization is required transportation to and from the place of hospitalization shall be furnished.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I shall not be able to fully discuss the matter that I intend to discuss, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] present?

Mr. BEGG. He is always here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am wondering why he does not object, I do not.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his objections?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I shall direct my remarks solely to that one provision in the pending Army appropriation bill set out on the top of page 9, as follows:

Pay of officers: For pay of officers of the line and staff, $30,338,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid to Maj. Charles C. Cresson, United States Army.

I am sure I will be pardoned for taking a very particular interest in that portion of the bill which attempts to cut off the pay of Major Cresson. Charles C. Cresson is a boyhood friend of mine. I have grown up with him in the city of San Antonio, Tex., and have known him all of my life, and knowing him as I do I unhesitatingly testify to his honesty and integrity as a citizen and as an officer of the United States Army. There is no higher or better type of man to be found anywhere than Major Cresson. He volunteered for service in the late war, almost immediately after its outbreak, and held a commission as lieutenant colonel in the National Army, and was later commissioned as major in the Regular Army of the United States.

There should not, and I hope will not, be any partisanship in the discussion and determination of this proviso, and I shall endeavor to present my remarks in a fair and dignified manner, and without attempting to ascribe motives for the action of any Member of this House.

The first proposition I desire to discuss is the propriety of the Appropriations Committee of the House in writing such a provision in an appropriation bill. The Appropriations Committee is not a legislating committee, but in this instance this committee is attempting to deprive an officer of the Army, duly commissioned by the President of the United States, of his office by taking away from him the pay provided by law. It does not require argument to convince any fair-minded Member of this House that it is not only unfair and unjust but contrary to all of the principles of Americanism. The law provides that if any officer in the Army has acted corruptly or in a manner prejudicial to military law or regulation he shall be tried by a court-martial.

The recommendations of the Appropriations Committee, if enacted into law, would establish a most dangerous precedent. It would authorize the enforced withdrawal of every officer in the Army or Navy and would permit Congress to destroy the Army and Navy and would also empower Congress to withhold from any officer in the executive or judicial branch of the Government the pay allowed by law and force his retirement. It would establish a precedent whereby Congress could control the action of the Supreme Court of the United States or any other Federal judge. It can be argued with as much reason that the Appropriations Committee, if it saw fit, could appropriate money for the pay of Members of Congress and also provide that none of the money so appropriated shall be paid to Congressman "A" or Congressman "B," or even go so far as to prohibit the pay to all Congressmen belonging to the minority party. Many similar illustrations might be given. In short, such a precedent, if established, could be made to destroy the Government itself and to prevent it from functioning.

I am not sure whether the proviso under consideration will be subject to a point of order. I am informed that it would not be. If that is a fact, then it behooves Members of Congress to be all the more careful in the consideration of the motion to strike out the proviso which I intend to make when the bill is read under the five-minute rule. I desire at this time to call attention to the fact that Maj. Charles C. Cresson has never at any time had an opportunity to appear and be heard before any committee to defend the charges and insinuations that have been brought against him. In my opinion, no unfairer or more unjust action has ever been taken than is contemplated in this bill. The fundamental principle of our Government that the three departments of government should be kept separate, distinct, and independent is absolutely destroyed if the proviso is not stricken from the bill. It is an alarming situation that confronts us when it is proposed to deprive a citizen of his rights without being given an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. It is nothing less than "lynch law" practiced in the city of Washington, the heart of the Republic, and under the very dome of the Capitol.

I want to say that I am appearing in behalf of Major Cresson and no other officer whose name is also mentioned in this bill. Others may speak for him and present his case. I do know, and I want to repeat, that Charles C. Cresson is as blameless of any wrongdoing as is any officer of the Army or even any Congressman that sits in this body.

Mr. BLANTON. I would just like to ask my colleague one question.

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever read the report that was filed by a committee of this House on the escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll?

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has he read what that committee has said about this particular officer and his apologies for prosecuting the man who let Bergdoll get away?

Mr. WURZBACH. I am glad the gentleman from Texas has injected that remark, because I intended to go into a full discussion of that report, and I know that that discussion will cover considerable ground, and the Members of the House will realize that I should be given sufficient time to discuss that report, but which will be impossible for me to do in the limited time granted me. I can see from the gentleman's statement that he is under the same suspicion that a great many Members of this House are under—

Mr. BLANTON. We are not under suspicion; it is Major Cresson who is under suspicion.

Mr. WURZBACH. I am sure that probably not a Member of this House excepting perhaps the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has ever read the court-martial proceedings against Major or Colonel Hunt. Probably only one-tenth of the membership of this House has read the report of the special House committee that had under investigation a resolution seeking to ascertain the responsibility for the escape of Bergdoll and for the failure to recapture him. In order to discuss that report fully as well as to refer to the court-martial proceedings of Colonel Hunt I ought to be given sufficient time to go into the whole proceedings thoroughly.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the decision of the court-martial—

Mr. WURZBACH. Please let me go on and I will get to that if you will only give me time. I desire now to give a brief history of the transactions leading up to the act of the Appropriations Committee in stopping the pay of Major Cresson. Grover Cleveland Bergdoll was tried and convicted in the early part of March, 1920. He was prosecuted and convicted by Charles C. Cresson, who at that time was a colonel in the National Army, not in the Regular Army, but an emergency officer.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield just a second?

Mr. WURZBACH. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to suggest to my colleague that if it is too long to read, will he publish that report of the court-martial proceedings on extension of your remarks or the verdict so we may read it? We have not access to it.

Mr. WURZBACH. I am glad my friend from Texas has made that suggestion, and I am going to ask now that the address of Major Cresson at the court-martial proceedings of Colonel Hunt and also the testimony offered by Major Cresson in that case be made a part of the record. I am going to refer to it, but I would like to have it inserted and extend all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—but for the information of the Members I would like to have all the facts before them, and I am going to ask when they read this to turn to the record of last February, 1923, and read part of the report our colleague [Mr. JOHNSON] made on this case that I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at that time in regard to the Bergdoll case, and he will see what was in the minds of the committee of our House.

Mr. WURZBACH. I am not making any charges against any Member of this Congress nor impugning the motives of any Member. I have always tried to discuss controversial matters in a decent and dignified way, but I do expect to compare the report mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] with the court-martial proceedings, a copy of which I have before me.

When I was interrupted I had stated that Bergdoll was convicted in March, 1920. I want to state further that on May 21, following, Bergdoll escaped. His escape was due, it was charged at that time, and as I am also inclined to believe, to the negligence of one or more officers of the Army. Some of the negligence may be traced to Washington and the Adjutant General, Gen. P. C. Harris, and a great deal more negligence may be attributed to Colonel Hunt. Certain it is that Bergdoll's escape within about two months after his conviction was effected under circumstances that would naturally arouse the suspicion that there was negligence on the part of the officers who had him in charge at that time. On July 12, 1920, court-martial proceedings were accordingly instituted against Colonel Hunt. The charge and specification were prepared in Washington, and Major Cresson was detailed as acting judge advocate in his trial. Colonel Hunt was charged with a violation of the ninety-sixth Article of War, and the specification set out negligence upon his part in permitting Bergdoll's escape, but I call attention to the fact that it was not charged that he was guilty of any corruption or that he was bribed, but the charge was based solely upon allegations of negligence. I will briefly narrate the facts surrounding Bergdoll's escape. Sometime prior to May 21 Gen. P. C. Harris, after listening to the cock-and-bull story that was put up to him by attorneys for Bergdoll and General Ansell, who had then retired from the Army, but who seemed to have had considerable influence in the Adjutant General's Office, wrote a confidential letter to Colonel Hunt at Governors Island instructing him to send Bergdoll under guard to West Philadelphia and thence to the mountains of Maryland to seek a supposed pot of gold holding $150,000. It is not now necessary to go into the details of what transpired in Philadelphia and how Bergdoll escaped while at his mother's home. It is sufficient to say that the two sergeants who were acting as guards for Bergdoll were guilty of the grossest negligence, but it may also be said that such negligence was due to the negligence of Colonel Hunt in not having a commissioned officer accompany the two sergeants, in not providing the sergeants with handcuffs, and without giving them sufficient instructions as to their duties while guarding said prisoner.

Major Cresson vigorously prosecuted Colonel Hunt, as will appear from a reading of the court-martial proceedings, but the latter was found not guilty by a court made up of 11 colonels of the Army. It is not for me to criticize the verdict and judgment, but I do insist that the record will bear me out in the statement that Major Cresson did all in his power to secure a conviction, as will appear from a reading not only of his testimony and closing argument but from the entire court-martial record. Major Cresson did the unusual thing of testifying, and, in fact, furnished the most damaging testimony that was introduced against Colonel Hunt. At this time I want to call attention to the fact that after Colonel Hunt's acquittal, Major Cresson prosecuted and convicted Erwin Bergdoll in a military court and assisted in the prosecution and conviction of Mrs. Emma Bergdoll, one Braun, a brother of the other Bergdoll, and also assisted in the prosecution of one Romig, a friend of the Bergdoll family. This action ought to furnish conclusive proof that Major Cresson was not under the influence of any of the Bergdolls at the time he prosecuted Colonel Hunt, and, strange to say, without any proof whatever to support it, the Johnson report almost directly charges corruption upon the part of Major Cresson in his prosecution of Colonel Hunt. All the cohorts of the Bergdoll family except Grover C. and Erwin were prosecuted in the Federal courts of the United States, and Major Cresson, on his own time and at his own expense, assisted in their prosecutions. He made two trips to Kansas City, at his own expense, to prevent the release of Erwin Bergdoll on habeas corpus proceedings instituted by him.

I have before me the report referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], which is the report filed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do not think the report was exactly fair, although I do not want to say there was any intention to deceive, or anything of that kind. But just looking at the report—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. I ask for additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is controlled by the two sides.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Give him some more time if you can. We would like to hear something about this case.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. WURZBACH. Can I not get some time from the other side? This is not a partisan matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. WURZBACH. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. WURZBACH. I think I shall now read part of Major Cresson's address to the court in order to fully convince Members of the House that the case against Colonel Hunt was most vigorously prosecuted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to know if Major Cresson appeared before the special committee of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] was a member and before the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WURZBACH. No. I want to say that Major Cresson did not appear before any committee, either the appropriations subcommittee or general committee, nor the special congressional committee; nor, in fact, has he had any hearing at all. I want to add that he requested, both by letter and telegram, an opportunity to appear before that special committee, and he was not afforded an opportunity to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Before the gentleman proceeds further will he permit me to inject just a few remarks right there?

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The facts are these about Major Cresson not appearing before the committee: I was a member of the committee, and—

Mr. WURZBACH. This will not be taken out of my time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; it will; but I will give you 10 minutes more. I have already given you 10 minutes. I will give you full opportunity.

I was a member of the committee which investigated the fake trial of Colonel Hunt. The proceedings of the trial of Colonel Hunt, as conducted by Major Cresson, were read, including his speech. I made the remark that Hunt had been whitewashed. That statement found its way into the public press to the effect that I had said Major Cresson had whitewashed Colonel Hunt. I believed when the report was written that he did attempt and did succeed in whitewashing Hunt, and I believe that now. But when that statement appeared in the papers, that Cresson had whitewashed Hunt, Cresson telegraphed me from out in Nebraska, inviting attention to what he had seen in the papers, and asked that I would read the court-martial proceedings of Hunt before the committee and that I would read his speech before the committee, and, further, that he would like to appear before the committee. I complied with his request by reading the record and his speech, just as he had asked. Then I took up with Mr. Peters, the chairman of the committee, that part of Cresson's request that he be permitted to come before the committee and told Mr. Peters that I favored his coming, because, for one reason at least, I regarded his prosecution of Hunt so vulnerable that I would like to meet him face to face and ask him a lot of questions. I told Mr.

Peters I thought this man ought to come before the committee, and that was the very reason for it. I sent Cresson a telegram saying that his request, in so far as I was concerned, had been complied with, and that the chairman of the committee, Mr. Peters, would answer him as to the question of whether he should appear before the committee or not.

Now then, we who wrote the report criticizing Cresson favored his coming here, while those who wrote the minority report refusing to criticize Cresson, did not permit him to come. So it is now being made to appear that what I and others, constituting the majority of the committee, did was wrong, and that what those who represented the minority opinion did in not letting this man come was right.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three more minutes on account of the time I have taken.

Mr. WURZBACH. I read not only the report but I read the hearings, and that was not the impression I received, unless the matters the gentleman from Kentucky refers to occurred in executive session.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; they did not appear in executive session; that is, this latter part of it. I went to Peters's room and asked him to telegraph this man to come on, but Congressman Peters telegraphed him the opposite. I followed the matter up to his office.

Mr. WURZBACH. Here it is, what I gathered from the hearings. As appears on page 395 of said hearing:

PORT CROOK, NEBR., May 11.

Mr. JOHNSON,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

With your kind permission, I desire to state my acts did not whitewash Col. John Hunt. Being detailed as trial judge advocate, I prosecuted him vigorously. I was also the trial judge advocate who convicted both the Bergdolls, and during Grover Bergdoll's trial had disagreements with Colonel Hunt. In justice to you and myself, please present to the Bergdoll investigating committee the court-martial record of Hunt's trial, especially testimony and exhibits I offered, my testimony and my arguments to the court, all showing I earnestly tried for and insisted on conviction. My opinion then was record and trial would justify conviction through Hunt guilty. Still have the same ideas. Have written you fully. Would gladly appear before your committee as witness if adjourned meeting could be held after June 5. Have many important conferences, meetings, cases set here up to June 5. Impossible to leave here before then. Please read this telegram publicly to your committee. Many thanks to you in advance. Wait your advice.

CHARLES C. CRESSON.

Mr. JOHNSON, it appears from the hearings immediately preceding the above-quoted wire, read the same to the committee, and immediately following the insertion of the same in the hearing further stated:

In that connection I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the record, including the testimony taken at the trial of Hunt, is already in, and that I shall content myself with that record to show that Hunt was whitewashed.

Chairman Peters stated:

The evidence of Colonel Cresson, of course, would be entirely collateral and have no bearing whatever in what we are trying to arrive at in our investigation.

As before stated, I gathered from a reading of the hearings that it was stated by one or more members of the committee that anything that Cresson might say to that committee was not pertinent to any issue, and I think they were right. The congressional committee had no authority under the House resolution they were acting under to make any findings with reference to Cresson at all for the reason that the resolution provided for only two things; first, to ascertain and fix the responsibility for the escape of Bergdoll, and, second, to fix the responsibility for the negligent failure to recapture him after his escape. That is all that committee had power to do under that resolution. The investigation of Hunt's action with reference to Bergdoll's escape was entirely proper, but it was not contemplated nor intended that there should be any investigation of Colonel Cresson's action in the matter of the prosecution of Colonel Hunt. Notwithstanding all of this and notwithstanding the fact that Colonel Cresson was not given an opportunity to appear before said committee a large part of the report of the said committee was devoted to criticism and denunciation of Colonel Cresson's alleged failure to prosecute Colonel Hunt. This report was filed in the House, but never acted upon, and I learn for the first time to-day that it was through the efforts of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that the same was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is now being brought up again in this Army appropriation bill.

I will now read you parts of the address of Colonel Cresson in the court-martial trial, and after I have done so I want to refer to some of the statements made in the report of the congressional committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman read Colonel Cresson's opening remarks?

Mr. WURZBACH. Yes; that is the very thing I am about to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And that is the very thing I want the gentleman to read.

Mr. WURZBACH. And I want the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to hold before him the report that he has mentioned and note what portions were taken out of Colonel Cresson's speech and what was omitted from the speech, because the parts omitted qualify and change in toto the substance and meaning of the parts that were put into the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question which has been asked and answered in a part of the time he has taken, and that is if he thinks the entire record should have been put into the report in view of the fact that the entire record and Colonel Cresson's speech were put in the record.

Mr. WURZBACH. The speech of Colonel Cresson was not put in the record, and I think, in view of the fact that he requested it, it should have been done; it was not a very long speech, and I think it might have been put in; in fact, this report states that it is a part of the record.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If that is correct, then the word "report" was inadvertently used for "record."

Mr. WURZBACH. Well, that is a fact. I will now read Colonel Cresson's opening remarks in part submitted to the court before the introduction of testimony:

Briefly, the issue in this case, stripped of any phraseology, is that Lieut. Col. John E. Hunt, being commandant, did not use sufficient precaution in guarding prisoner Bergdoll, especially in not having a commissioned officer accompany him, in view of the circumstances contained in the letter signed by Col. Julius Penn, and in not handcuffing the prisoner and in not sufficiently instructing the guard; that on account of such neglect and lack of care and prudence on the part of the accused, Colonel Hunt, the prisoner was enabled to escape in Philadelphia, and did so escape, on the 21st day of May, 1920.

The Government disclaims, and personally and on behalf of the prosecution, any idea of there being anything crooked or any collusion on the part of Colonel Hunt in this matter, or that any money was used, the only charge in the matter being simply a neglect of duty and failure to take due precautions in the matter.

I have called attention to these remarks because of the fact that particular attention was called to the last paragraph by the report of the congressional committee, and I have included the first paragraph in order to explain why Colonel Cresson made the statement contained in the latter paragraph.

I will now read from the court-martial proceedings, beginning on page 302 thereof, portions of Colonel Cresson's remarks after the evidence was all in and the cause was submitted to the court.

PROSECUTION (Colonel Cresson). May it please the court, on behalf of the prosecution, it becomes my duty to sum up and endeavor to place before this court the facts and the evidence on which the Government relies—on which we honestly and earnestly ask a verdict of guilty on the charge and specification.

Of course, the court realizes, as everyone does, that it is not a pleasant duty that devolves on the prosecution in any case, civil or criminal, to come before the court and ask that a brother officer be punished, or be admonished, or held guilty of a neglect of duty. But the prosecution has tried to do its duty in this case, proposes to do it now, and leave it to you gentlemen of the court to do your duty under your oaths.

As I stated in the opening of this case, I want to state again that the prosecution does not for a minute think, nor does it intimate, nor does it care to have anyone think or intimate, that Colonel Hunt in any way wanted Bergdoll to escape, that he colluded in the matter, or was in any way in any conspiracy. We realize that to-day Colonel Hunt is probably the sorriest man of all that this man did escape.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the part I wanted the gentleman to read.

Mr. WURZBACH. Well, I have read that and I am going to comment on it. I think that was a most appropriate statement to make, especially in view of the fact that in the charge and specification under which Colonel Hunt was prosecuted—and the specification and charge were prepared here in Washington—there is not one syllable or allegation claiming that there was any collusion; that it was purely a matter of negligence. I have those specifications and that charge in this court-martial proceeding, and I will also ask that they be incorporated in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert the specifications and charge in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WURZBACH. Major Cresson continues right after that:

But we do maintain that the accused in this case did not use the proper, necessary precautions that he should have used in this particular case under the advice and instructions that he received.

In this case we are not trying whether the method of governing any prison is right or wrong, whether the conscientious objector is a valued institution in this land or not; we are not trying the policy of the War Department; we are not trying the policy in any barracks.

Colonel Hunt has a fine record as a prison officer, and the Government is not denying that. We are not trying The Adjutant General of the Army for having issued the order. We are not trying the sergeants for having let him escape. Whether or not they are guilty is for another court to decide if they should be tried.

The only issue in this case is, Is Colonel Hunt guilty of that degree—we might use it to follow counsel for the defense in his flight in civil law—of "contributory negligence" as to constitute him an accessory before the fact, and to make him guilty in failing to use precautions charged as necessary in this case?

I am just picking these things out at random, but I am going to have the entire speech inserted in the RECORD, and I trust all the Members will read it. At another place he says:

Colonel Hunt puts people on the stand to tell you what they would have done, that they thought they would do what he did, and therefore that he did use sufficient force. Gentlemen, there is no use arguing a hypothetical question on this.

The system or practice that prevailed at that institution had been cited as an excuse for Colonel Hunt's conduct, and Cresson here is making light of that defense.

The physical facts show that Colonel Hunt sent that man to Philadelphia, and that the prisoner is gone. Sufficient force was not used.

He goes on further and discusses the question of the good record of Colonel Hunt, and I would like to have the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] hear this. They complain of the fact that this was not a vigorous prosecution on the part of Cresson and as an evidence of that fact refer to the fact that Cresson refers to the good character of Hunt and his previous good character as an officer. Major Cresson goes on and says this in his address:

There is no doubt about it. The question of the good record of Colonel Hunt, however, is a question that goes to the question of clemency, a question for the reviewing authority after a verdict of guilty, but not to the question of was he guilty or not guilty in this particular case.

At another point he refers to Lieutenant Heffernan, who was counsel for the defense, as follows:

Lieutenant Heffernan said had the guards been watchful, had they done their full duty, this man would not have escaped. Possibly he would not. Guards do not always stay where they should. But what caused the guards to relax in their duty? It was due to Colonel Hunt. The question of handcuffs was brought up and Colonel Hunt said to the man, "You do not even have to take handcuffs; this man is a model prisoner"—that he told you about—and "he will not escape." He paid so little attention to it that he sent out this expedition and only instructs one sergeant. He did not instruct both sergeants. He tells it to only one sergeant and takes the chance of the orders being boggled in transmission.

All the time pointing out the neglect of Colonel Hunt in not giving proper instructions to these sergeants, and only giving one of the sergeants instructions, and then he says:

And the only place where there is much of a conflict in the testimony in this case between the prosecution and the defense is as to what Sergeant O'Hare thought, and it is clear to every man in this court that Sergeant O'Hare got the impression from Colonel Hunt that Gibboney was to tell him what to do; that he was to go to Gibboney. He only had $15 and could not have come back should he wanted to unless he had gone to Gibboney or gone to Bergdoll.

I want you to note the strength and the force of the argument that Major Cresson is making against Hunt, and I challenge gentlemen of the House, after hearing his words, to reconcile such a speech with a failure to vigorously prosecute Hunt. It has been intimated that there was not only a failure to properly prosecute but also corruption is charged on the part of Colonel Cresson, an honored officer in the Army of the United States.

Major Cresson continues his argument as follows:

By Colonel Hunt's actions those two sergeants were put down there in Philadelphia absolutely at the mercy of as pretty a set of crooks that ever got loose, and as the result the prisoner gets away. They were put in the hands of men who have been indicted—some of them—by the grand jury in Philadelphia for conspiracy in this case and another man who has been reprimanded.

As I said a while ago, the men he now refers to were later prosecuted by Colonel Cresson.

Those two ignorant sergeants were left to match their wits with a trio of sharpers, the likes of which we have never run across before. They were disarmed. They were disarmed by what Colonel Hunt told them and by his actions in the matter.

They did not have the two letters that Colonel Hunt had had relative to the guarding of this man. They were not fully advised, and yet even the War Department's suggestion that an officer accompany this guard was not followed by the accused.

I want to mention right in this connection that the two letters therein referred to were written in the judge advocate's office at Governors Island. They were written at the suggestion of Colonel Cresson, and those letters were written to Hunt and called Hunt's attention to the dangerous character of this man Grover Bergdoll and warned him, which shows that at that time Cresson was using every effort to bring about a proper guarding of this man. He was not content with that. He also went on the witness stand in this case and testified to those facts, stating that he had secured the writing of these letters, and also testified to his complaining of the laxity in the guarding of Bergdoll during the time of the trial about March 4. Then he goes on in his argument—

Colonel Hunt said that the only directions in this case, the only orders he had, were the orders contained in this letter signed by Colonel Penn, the adjutant general, and he was not going to follow the intimations, the suggestion, contained in that letter. In other words, he followed out just what he wanted to; those that he did not want to follow out he did not.

He did not follow out the suggestion as to a commissioned officer. There was a commissioned officer there on duty, Captain Shackford, I think the name was, who said he was acting as adjutant. Certainly if he was capable of acting as adjutant he was capable enough to go down there, and that would have left Colonel Hunt and Major Humphrey, and one or two officers up there. Captain Shackford was also there, and he could have gone. He is a line officer, and as a line officer, not on sick report, he could have gone.

There is not a single line anywhere in these instructions that would prohibit or inhibit the use of handcuffs. The only thing here is to keep this confidential and not divulge the purpose of the expedition, and that purpose as shown by the other letter was to dig the gold. Of course, it was not expected that some people would not see Bergdoll. That is the situation.

"Take your handcuffs—handcuff him whenever necessary—watch him, for he is a slippery customer." Had Colonel Hunt used any such proper language—the words that the old sergeant used—"Don't let the blankety-blank get away"—this situation would have never occurred. But they were not used. The sergeants were disarmed.

They went down there. What did they do? They were to meet men with fine records—they had confidence in Mr. Gibboney—they expected to do as he told them to—Mr. Gibboney was really in command of that expedition—and they expected to do anything that he wanted. And Sergeant O'Hare was mixed up. He thought the main trip was to Washington to see Mr. Samuel T. Ansell and get a pardon down there. It was not beaten into him what his duty was in this case—that is the whole point as to Colonel Hunt's negligence.

What is the indictment? The charge and specification show in this case, as the record also shows, there was prepared and forwarded to this officer, the accused, two letters which Colonel Hunt denominated as being a great deal of "bunk."

I now want to run through the case briefly to show you that the prosecution has proved every word and line.

"You will complete such arrangements as may be necessary with the counsel for this prisoner, and will send him under suitable guard."

What was the suitable guard? In this very letter that came to him the suggestion for a suitable guard was that they be accompanied by a commissioned officer.

Had handcuffs been taken down there in conformity with the suggestion in the letter of Colonel Weigel, had a suitable guard been sent, there would have been no trial to-day of Colonel Hunt, there would have been no intimation that he was neglectful of his duty, that his acts tended to bring discredit upon the military service and were to the prejudice of good order and military discipline. You gentlemen know that when an officer is advised by the adjutant for the commanding general, directed by the commanding general to do a certain thing, and then by The Adjutant General of the Army, and neglects all those directions, he neglects them at his peril.

"Under a suitable guard to accompany at least one of his counsel to such places as may be necessary"—places referred to in such letter—and wherein it was also suggested that an officer accompany the guard. That is the suitable guard that is charged in this count.

"Did at Governors Island on or about the 29th day of May, 1920, having been previously advised, informed, and warned that said Bergdoll was a prisoner of dangerous character and likely to attempt to escape from restraint at the first opportunity, suffered and permitted, in spite of said advice, information, and warning, and in violation of and contrary to the custom of said barracks prevailing in like cases, said prisoner Bergdoll to leave said barracks on the date aforesaid not properly and suitably guarded, in view of said information and warning"—that is, not with a commissioned officer, not with handcuffs, not with the two guards properly instructed.

Let us go back to the letter. When this man Bergdoll escaped—it was common talk here and generally known all over the island he would do so at the first chance—these are the things proven in this case: Colonel Hunt was not tried for the escape of the other 12 prisoners, but for this thirteenth man he is. And why? Because in this specific case, on account of the notoriety of the man escaping, on account of the character of this man—not the danger that he would kill anyone; nobody ever thought that that miserable, contemptible slacker who deserted his country in the hour of need would kill anybody; men of that stripe of yellow are not dangerous in that way. He was dangerous as to trying to escape; he was dangerous as trying to escape from control, as he has shown, and as he has done.

In the letter of January 20 there is not a line about any man not coming back from the hospital. It warns him of the reputed dangerous character—the escaping character. There is nothing here that he was going to kill anybody, but to watch him; and it says, "Until the trial of Bergdoll it is the request of the department commander that Bergdoll be not permitted to leave the disciplinary barracks unless in response to a written request signed by the department adjutant or one of his assistants . . . and not intrusted to the sole custody of the trial judge advocate," but always guarded.

Then what comes up? The question came up about the man being brought down here to court-martial, guarded by a sentinel equipped with only a stick, and General Weigel writes a letter calling attention to the other letter. "The department commander directs"—and we are not trying Colonel Hunt for a disobedience of this order. If so, there might be some technical question of whether the barracks was within the jurisdiction of the department commander. This was merely introduced in evidence in this case to show that Colonel Hunt, as commandant of that barracks, had notice of the dangerous, escaping character, the slippery elm character, of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll. Specific instructions were given. This letter is written and is dated after he was taken from the island, after Colonel Hunt had been advised, after the carrying of this man over to New York City on his application for a writ of habeas corpus, that he had been handcuffed. He had been brought down without any handcuffs, and they were using the handcuffs of the civil authorities. There was not any way to handcuff him then provided by the accused, and, the evidence shows, that was done at my request, because I did not want to take any chances on that fellow escaping. We handcuffed him, we took him over, and we brought him back. And Colonel Hunt sent him down without handcuffs, without sufficient guard, and he is gone, and the Army is a laughing stock to-day. That is the contrast between the actions of an officer of the department judge advocate's office and the commandant of the barracks. We will face the issue and meet the contrast.

In addition, his character had been reported by the police authorities.

As to the guard contemplated by the instructions. "And then and there failed and neglected to instruct said guard or either of them to handcuff said prisoner, or to direct that said guard be provided with handcuffs for that purpose in case of need therefor, and failed and neglected to give said guard, or either of them, sufficient and adequate instructions as to their journey, the care and safeguarding of the prisoner, and their course of conduct," and O'Hare and York testified on the stand that York was not even seen by Colonel Hunt, so it rests entirely on what he told O'Hare. The only idea O'Hare had was to go down there and meet Mr. Gibboney in Philadelphia, that was about all he got from the instructions, and after that to do anything Gibboney said. He had those two careful old sergeants going around riding in an automobile all one afternoon, going to the theater in the evening, playing pool with the prisoners.

Colonel Humphrey on the witness stand said that the seventy-third article of war tells you everything, and the seventy-third article of war tells you the offense those sergeants committed in permitting the prisoner to escape. The seventy-third article of war is merely a way of "passing the buck" from Colonel Hunt to those sergeants, and if the sergeants were on trial they might possibly "pass the buck" back to somebody else. There was not any passing of the buck in the testimony of that sergeant. He told you what he did. The prosecution in this case does not want to "pass the buck" from Colonel Hunt to those sergeants. Let each bear his share, and they can all be guilty, Colonel Hunt for failing to instruct them properly and for failing to supply those handcuffs. If Colonel Hunt had instructed them properly and they had been supplied with handcuffs they might not have brought back Bergdoll, arguing the hypothetical question, whether or not there was sufficient force used.

But there is no hypothetical question in this case. It is a physical fact that you can not get away from. Bergdoll, the slippery, dangerous prisoner, serving a five-year affirmed sentence, with every desire to get away, got away. He is gone, he is not back, and he is gone because he was sent to Philadelphia. Those guards were improperly instructed by the accused in this case, and "by reason of which carelessness, negligence, failure, and neglect of duty in the premises" on the part of Colonel Hunt, said prisoner escaped from the custody of his guard.

That is the whole charge in this case. Every bit of it. And the prosecution believes it has made a case out on that line.

We believe honestly that we have done our duty and shown to this court Colonel Hunt's negligence, that he knew of the bringing of this man here in handcuffs, and the general publicity, had knowledge that the only way to handle him properly was as was done when the man was on trial; the letter written in January, and the subsequent letter, all bringing home notice to Colonel Hunt that this was a special case and needed special attention.

One of the sergeants on the stand said that with a man like that he certainly would have handcuffed him. One of the sergeants on the stand testified to that—not O'Hare. All the evidence brings it home to the accused, especially the letter, to which the main defense by the accused is that it was outside of the jurisdiction of General Bullard. He is not being tried for a violation of an order of General Bullard.

Did that give him notice? Was the letter signed by Colonel Weigel, Chief of Staff, of sufficient worth to put a man on notice of the dangerous escaping character of this man? It was not the statement of a mere "fly-by-night."

It has been suggested that possibly Mr. Gibboney should have been called as a witness in this case, and the prosecution wants to state why he was not, so that it will be on record why this was not done. When I represent the prosecution, put a witness on the stand, I want to be able to vouch for his good character, his reliability, and his credibility, and I could not put, and would not put Mr. Gibboney on the stand, vouch and stand sponsor for what Mr. Gibboney would tell this court. It might have been, probably he would have "passed the buck" and unloaded on Colonel Hunt, and I do not think the prosecution would have gained a thing if Mr. Gibboney had done that.

Gentlemen, I would not try—I would not attempt to wring a verdict even from a jury by oratorical effort, or an impassioned plea, and certainly I do not think it proper in a court-martial. I think it proper to present the case dispassionately, giving all credit for everything that is due to the defendant, as I have endeavored to do in this case. I have sympathy for Colonel Hunt. He has a fine record, has been retired as a colonel. Colonel Hunt has indeed made a magnificent record as an officer and as to the care of some prisoners. But that is not the question in this case. All that goes to clemency. I am glad to be able to say that no one can throw any suspicion of crookedness on the part of Colonel Hunt in this matter. I want to be well understood by the press and everybody else that this is a technical violation, such a violation of military law as to bring discredit on the military service and prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

I am going to ask you gentlemen by your verdict of guilty in this case to say, so that all officers will know, when the adjutant, when the commanding general, and when the chief of staff suggests to them a certain line of action that if they do not follow that line of action, it is at their own peril. Colonel Hunt had his choice; he is responsible for the acts of his agents and he is responsible for his own actions. He was warned and he deliberately made his choice.

On behalf of the United States Army, on account of these regulations, and for the sake of good order and military discipline, I respectfully ask you gentlemen for a verdict of guilty of the charge and the specifications.

I thank you.

I have called attention heretofore to the fact that Major Cresson not only vigorously prosecuted Colonel Hunt but also did the rather unusual thing of testifying for the Government against the accused, and I now present the following excerpt from the court-martial proceedings appearing on pages 102, 103, and 104:

It is generally rather bad practice for a prosecuting attorney in any case to testify, but owing to the exigencies in this case, and the fact that I happened to be prosecuting attorney and Captain Hannay asstant in the Bergdoll case, and some matters came up then directly bearing on it, I deem it my duty to be sworn and testify in this case as to those facts.

Lieut. Col. Charles C. Cresson, judge advocate, a witness for the prosecution, was sworn and testified as follows:

Questions by prosecution:

Q. What is your full name, rank, organization, and station?—A. Charles C. Cresson, lieutenant colonel, Judge Advocate's Department, assistant judge advocate, Eastern Department, stationed at Governors Island.

Q. Do you know the officer on trial in this case?—A. I do.

Q. State who he is.—A. Lieut. Col. John E. Hunt, Infantry, retired, now on active duty.

Q. Do you desire to make a statement before the court in this case?—A. I do; in connection with the question of notice, I desire to state that as trial judge advocate of the general court-martial, which tried Grover C. Bergdoll in this room—trial began on the morning of March 4—at that time the prisoner, Bergdoll, was brought down here guarded by a man with a stick—I instructed Captain Hannay to telephone about the matter, or endeavored myself to take the matter up with, I think it was, Major Humphrey, but I think Captain Hannay reached him or the adjutant and complained about the matter; that was on Thursday, the 4th. The court-martial adjourned over the 5th, and we went from Governors Island to New York City on a habenas corpus which was sued out by Bergdoll, to appear before Judge Hand at the hearing of the writ; the prisoner was then brought down. I found him down there with two sentries, not handcuffed. I objected and instructed Mr. Sparks over there in the court to handcuff him and to use his own handcuffs in bringing him back. They brought him back here and took him back to the court again that afternoon. At that time it was his open boast that "an hour's liberty and there would be no court-martial." The next day was Saturday. The prisoner came down here guarded by a soldier with a stick. I then took the matter up again with Colonel Gullion and with General Weigel, the chief of staff, and stated that I had been advised by police officers of Philadelphia; by John O'Connor, of the Department of Justice; and others of the dangerous character of this man. I had investigated his police record. It was evident that he would get away on the first chance, and it was an open boast that "an hour's liberty and there would be no court-martial." Colonel Gullion then took it up and an order was issued, signed by General Weigel, that whenever he was moved away from the island to have him handcuffed. The first letter was written by Colonel Gullion in our office, on information and complaint possibly that originated with me on account of the man having come back from the hospital without a guard. The guard was with him and left him, and he came back without a guard. I do not think there is anything further I have to state now.

Questions by defense:

Q. At that time, Colonel, the Twenty-second Infantry could have provided all the guard that your department considered necessary, couldn't it?—A. I do not know, Lieutenant Heffernan, whether it could or could not; I do not know.

Q. Couldn't the department commander give any order he wished to the commanding officer of the Twenty-second Infantry?—A. I assume he could; certainly.

Q. There is no question that he could have provided within the department all the guard that he needed?—A. Certainly he could; he could have ordered out a battalion if he wished, but the man was in the custody of Major Hunt, as commandant, holding him for us; they were guarding him for us, and we were responsible up to March 30, when the general approved that sentence. Before that we were responsible for him, and I did not want him to get away when I had anything to do with it.

In closing I wish to offer for the consideration of the Members of the House the following statement of R. L. Bullard, major general, United States Army, in command of Second Corps Area at the date of the trial of Colonel Hunt, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SECOND CORPS AREA, GOVERNORS ISLAND,
New York City, August 23, 1921.

Maj. Charles C. Cresson, judge advocate, prosecuted for the Government the charges against Maj. John E. Hunt, in connection with the escape of G. C. Bergdoll, draft deserter. I noted especially Major Cresson's zeal and interest for the Government in this case. It seemed to me too great. It was so strong that I felt it necessary to caution him to feel less personal concern in the prosecution of the case, and that he should limit himself to doing his official duty (without too much of such personal concern) as laid down in the Army regulations and military law. Laxity in prosecution of the case, which took place at my headquarters, nowhere appeared to me either in the actual fact or in the report of the case.

R. L. BULLARD,
Major General, United States Army.

I also present for the consideration of my colleagues copy of resolutions adopted by Alamo Post, No. 2, American Legion, San Antonio, Tex., which I received through the mails this morning:

HEADQUARTERS ALAMO POST, NO. 2, AMERICAN LEGION,
San Antonio, Tex., March 17, 1924.

Whereas an attempt is now being made to obtain the passage of a provision in the Army appropriation bill now pending in Congress which would withhold the pay of Maj. Charles C. Cresson, a member of this post, a respected citizen of this community, and an officer with a long and honorable record of faithful service in the Army of the United States; and

Whereas the sole basis or excuse for this attempt is the wholly unwarranted, unfounded, and unjustifiable accusation that Major Cresson was lax in the prosecution of Colonel Hunt on charges growing out of the draft evasion of Grover and Erwin Bergdoll, who were prosecuted and convicted by Major Cresson; and

Whereas the plain facts, as apparent from the record of the Hunt trial and the uncontroverted statements of every unprejudiced person connected therewith and familiar with the facts, show conclusively that Major Cresson was not only in no way lax in the prosecution of the said case but that his zeal therein was so great as to elicit from his commanding officer, Maj. Gen. R. L. Bullard, in command at Governors Island at the time of the said prosecution, the following statement in connection with the Hunt and Bergdoll cases:

"I noticed especially Major Cresson's zeal and interest for the conviction of these cases. It seemed to me too great. It was so strong I felt it necessary to caution him to feel less personal concern in the prosecution of the cases and that he should limit himself to doing his official duty, without too much personal concern, as laid down in Army regulations and military law"; and Whereas this is the second of what appears to be a series of persistent efforts, all evidently coming from the same ultimate source and obviously inspired by the sinister design of the convicted Bergdolls to carry out their threat to destroy the good name of Major Cresson in revenge for the zeal which he showed in prosecuting and convicting them, the first attempt having been made before a congressional investigating committee over two years ago, at which time Major Cresson was denied, as he is now denied, an opportunity to be heard in his own defense: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, First, that we hereby ratify and reaffirm the resolution passed by this post on the occasion of the former attack on Major Cresson, a copy of said resolution being hereto attached.

Second, That we, as members of the American Legion and as American citizens, unqualifiedly condemn as a violation of constitutional right, justice, fairness, and every principle for which we stand the obviously malicious and wholly unjustifiable attempts that have been and are being made to destroy the well-merited reputation of a man whose character we know to be above reproach and whose record as an officer and a citizen is unimpeachable, and to deprive him of remuneration to which he is justly entitled without even giving him an opportunity to be heard in answer to the charges against him.

Third, That we regard it as a compliment to Major Cresson, and as an indorsement of our own high opinion of his integrity, courage, and fidelity to duty, that he has incurred the enmity of the persons immediately and ultimately responsible for the said attacks upon him.

Fourth, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to State and National headquarters of the American Legion, with the request that appropriate action be taken, since this matter is not merely local in its scope, but grows out of, and is an incident of, a matter of national importance, in which the American Legion as a national organization, as well as every patriotic American citizen individually, remains vitally interested, and that a copy be also transmitted to each member of the House Appropriations and Military Affairs Committees and to each representative from this State in the Senate and House of Representatives.

CARTER J. LYNCH, Chairman,
LEO BREWER,
C. N. DICKSON,
W. B. LOUGHBOROUGH.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WURZBACH. Then I will continue my remarks where I left off when the bill comes up for amendment under the five-minute rule. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that this Member of the House be permitted to continue. He is speaking in the defense of a friend, and friendship is too scarce in this world, and I would like him to have an opportunity to proceed. I will give him my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unfortunately the time is divided between the gentlemen representing the two sides, and the Chair has no control over it.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I know the Chair would give it if he could.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT].

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, if there is one lesson of the World War which stands out with impressive clearness and force, it is the vital necessity in advance of war and in time of peace of making preparation along the industrial side of warfare. As all know, the lack of provision in this regard was a source not only of delay and greatly increased cost, but, had the conditions been otherwise, without allies to hold the sea and the battle lines while we were preparing, it might have been the source of great embarrassment, if not discomfiture. In refashioning the national defense act after the World War to write into it the lessons of our experience, no subject more seriously engrossed the attention of Congress than that of making some provision to insure adequate supplies in time of war.

The principle that the whole matter of procurement of supplies for our military forces, both in peace and war, was a business rather than a purely military function was recognized. The control of supervision of this task had previously never been definitely fixed. In consequence the Congress wrote into the national defense act section 5 (a), imposing the responsibility of this supervision and control upon a civilian official, the Assistant Secretary of War, really raising that office to one of great importance. The Assistant Secretary of War was thereby charged not only with supervision of the procurement of supplies generally, but was made responsible for preparing plans in time of peace for industrial mobilization in time of war, or, in the words of the statute, with—the assurance of adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations to meet war-time needs.

This latter responsibility marks a turning point in our political and military history, for it recognizes the importance of planning for war on the industrial side, something to which little thought had been given before the World War in any country. Even militaristic nations like Germany had not studied this subject further than to estimate and keep on hand war reserves to carry them through an anticipated period of hostilities. The result was—quite contrary to general belief—that Germany was at a standstill after the first battle of the Marne for artillery ammunition and many other supplies just the same as the Allies were. On account of the thorough business organization which Germany had built up as a part of her world-wide ambition she was able to get into quantity production more quickly than either England or France.

It was my privilege to have been the first Assistant Secretary of War to be charged with this responsibility. When I left the War Department about a year ago this work had been in progress about 16 months, and during that time and since so much of fundamental character has been accomplished that I have deemed it not inappropriate to take advantage of the opportunity accorded by general debate upon the Army appropriation bill to give you some information on the subject and to call your attention to the vital need of further legislation on the side of industrial preparedness. There is, I believe, a very general misconception of the scope of the national defense act as a means of preparing for war. So far as any real or complete preparation for war is concerned the national defense act merely scratches the surface of the subject.

To be sure, it provides for a flexible and an expansible organization of the Regular Army, for drafting of the National Guard, for a properly organized General Staff, and for the creation of an Officers' Reserve Corps; it recognizes the principle that the supervision of procurement of supplies, as distinguished from their care and distribution, is a business proposition, and places this responsibility and that of preparing plans for industrial mobilization upon the Assistant Secretary of War; it authorizes the placing of compulsory orders for munitions, and provides means for procuring a nitrate supply. It will thus be seen that it makes no provision for actually mobilizing either the man power or the industrial resources of the country. It provides for the making of plans, but practically stops there. The successful waging of a great war, of course, as we now know, requires not only the mobilization of an army but of the whole Nation as well.

In any event, success will depend on four kinds of mobilization; first, of morale; second, of money; third, of men; and fourth, of munitions. Before we can intelligently plan for war we must ask ourselves what we have and what we require as to each of these. Much might be said of each of these elements, but, due to limitations of time, I would pass over the first three, except to say that in another emergency I hope we will find the principle firmly imposed upon the hearts and minds of our countrymen that there shall be no profiteering on the part of capital or labor or any other element of the population. [Applause.] As President Harding said in his inaugural address:

There is something inherently wrong with the democracy which sends its young men to war and at the same time gives their fellow countrymen at home the opportunity to make enormous profits.

[Applause.]

As to the mobilization of men, I hope it will not be long before we shall, in time of peace, write into our law the principle of selective service. Such a system would become operative, of course, only when war has been declared, and Congress—depending upon the emergency—had authorized it to be used. Failing to provide such a law will result, in the beginning of any war, in the flower of our young manhood leaving their tasks and volunteering, thereby throwing industry and the country generally out of gear, economically, at a time which we should expect the maximum efficiency in our economic life. The adoption of the selective-draft principle would make our people conservative in the matter of declaring war, because it would splash with blood the door post of rich and poor alike, and no man could shout for war on the theory that his neighbor would have to fight it.

The mobilization of man power and the mobilization of industry are, of course, twin problems. Man power alone can not win the war; munitions alone can not win the war. It is only when our fighting forces are properly, adequately, and punctually supplied with munitions that they can win the war. The mobilization of man power and the mobilization of industry must proceed hand in hand. The problem of industrial mobilization is to insure, so far as foresight may make possible, that our industrial establishments, our factories, and other sources of supply shall upon the outbreak of war turn as rapidly as possible from peace-time tasks to the production and creation of those things required for war effort. The rate of mobilization of our men and the speed with which they may be called to the colors and trained and sent forward must be regulated by our ability to supply them with munitions and all essential things they will require. The Army and Navy must have priority or first call upon all facilities for production. Of course, this call and the load so placed must be so adjusted that the essential needs of the people shall be disturbed or impaired only so far as necessary. In the comparatively short time since this work was started the following are some of the things that have been done:

There has been established in the office of the Assistant Secretary a central organization, and in each of the great supply branches of the Army a similar organization charged with the preparation of plans for obtaining munitions and all other needed supplies. The needs of the Army for a major war have been definitely defined and computed, something that has never been done before. The first real tentative mobilization program laid down in the history of our Government was given to the supply branches of the Army by the General Staff in October, 1921. General plans for industrial mobilization based thereon have been worked out, starting with the fundamental principle that the War Department must be able to state to industry what it wants and the rate of delivery. The War Department has figured out these requirements in the hundreds of thousands of items involved, has set up industrial procurement districts, and for some time since has been making the necessary survey of the industrial field to see how such requirements can best be met. Supply branches of the Army are now breaking these requirements into raw materials to determine where shortages may occur, and they will soon begin estimating requirements in power, labor, and transportation.

In fact, what the War Department has done to date in planning for procurement of munitions in time of war is concretely set forth in the first of a series of notes entitled, "Notes of Industrial Mobilization," issued under authority of my successor, Hon. Dwight F. Davis, the Assistant Secretary of War, which I shall include in the record of my remarks under permission for their extension. The War Department, I believe, has done and is doing all that it can reasonably be expected to do under the national defense act.

But the execution of mobilization involves a very definite and drastic control of industry, as was forcibly demonstrated not only here but in all other countries involved in the World War, where controls were found to be absolutely fundamental. These controls may be grouped as follows.

First. Control of raw materials, including power to establish priority of access and conservation measures intended to safeguard them.

Second. Control of foreign commerce, essential in order to prevent the exportation of needed raw materials and to facilitate the importation of such as we may require; also it is necessary to prevent raw materials reaching the enemy.

Third. Control of prices: Prices must be stabilized to the utmost extent possible and must be controlled by agreement or by coercion in order to prevent this economic snowball getting started on its career.

Fourth. Control of food: If the price of labor is to be stabilized, there must be an ample supply of food at reasonable prices. Nothing affects the morale of a people so quickly as a shortage of food or inordinate price demanded for same.

Fifth. Control of fuel: Even with our colossal resources in fuel, a fuel administrator was found necessary in the World War for the purpose of conserving fuel and maintaining the output with a diminished labor supply. Keeping down the cost of fuel keeps down the cost of manufacturing and eliminates this item of prospective trouble.

Sixth. Control of power: This is closely associated with the question of fuel. Power, like transportation, is dependent on peace-time industrial development. The placing of heavy war orders in limited areas results in shortages of power which must be overcome and can only be foreseen and eliminated by a central control agency.

Seventh. Control of capital: We found it necessary to control capital during the World War not only by means of excess-profit taxes but by the creation of a capital issues committee to prevent the creation of fly-by-night corporations and their issues of stock. A War Finance Corporation for the purpose of assisting legitimate concerns to obtain necessary credit through the medium of the Federal reserve system, and a War Credits Board for the purpose of advancing to contractors part payments on their work were also found essential.

Eighth. Control of labor: Labor, of course, is our biggest problem in time of war as it is in time of peace, but the various agencies set up in the World War for the purpose of controlling and directing its activities warn us that such control is inevitable and must be judiciously but effectively inaugurated immediately upon the outbreak of war.

Ninth. Control of transportation: The experience of the World War in the matter of the control of rail transportation by the Government is still fresh in the public mind. That some control will be necessary is absolutely certain, because our peace-time transportation system can hardly meet the demands made upon it when the channels of trade are normal. When they become abnormal, as they inevitably must in time of war, nothing but the pooling of the rolling stock of the railroads can solve the problem. Just so far as we plan intelligently for such control in time of peace, just so far will we avoid the perils of Government management and possible ultimate Government ownership. But rail transportation, however important, is only one of our means of transportation. We must control ocean shipping, which will be easy so long as the Emergency Fleet Corporation is in existence. We must inevitably assume control in time of war of all ocean shipping under the American flag in order that we may keep our trade routes open and assure ourselves a flow of raw materials, for which we are dependent on foreign countries, as well as insure the transportation of men and munitions to possible theater of operations overseas. Our inland waterways must be utilized in order to relieve the railroads as much as possible of the strain placed upon them. Nor can we neglect the importance of highway truck transport as a part of any nationally controlled and coordinated system of transportation.

Tenth. Control of communications: Due to the efficiency of our communication system, there is less control required in this respect than in most of the others, but even with our efficient telephone and telegraph systems, as well as with growing cable and radio systems, there will be congestion and new installations, which only centralized control can direct. At the same time, there will be demands for voluntary censorship and publicity measures needed by the Government to keep the people advised, as far as possible, how the war is being conducted.

Intelligently administered, these controls, with industry loyally cooperating, can, like traffic policemen, keep the stream of raw materials flowing without congestion from the source to the finished product. All of these controls were exercised during the World War, but were only developed from the stern exigencies of the situation as the war progressed. I shall include in the record of my remarks a description of all the controls exercised with their methods of operation. Our experience and the enormously increased cost ensuing from the lack of these controls in the early stages of the war make it our duty, I believe, to provide for each of these in time of peace so as to become available immediately upon the outbreak of a war. Now, what have we in this regard already? A rapid survey of laws heretofore enacted which have any relation to the mobilization of industry for war reveals the following:

(1) A Council of National Defense (act of August 29, 1916): This body can be useful in building up morale. The World War demonstrated that its advisory committee can not function properly, due to lack of executive power.

(2) Control of transportation: (a) The Army appropriation act, August 29, 1916, grants authority to the Federal Government to take over and operate any systems or system of transportation. (b) Authority to establish priorities in transportation for the distribution of troops and material. (Navy appropriation act, August 29, 1916.) No further authority is needed, therefore, to plan for the control of transportation, whether ocean, rail, highway, or inland waterway.

(3) Railway Labor Board: To adjust disputes between carriers and employees. (Act of February 28, 1920.) This legislation is quite insufficient to solve the question of control of labor in time of war.

(4) Obstructing war operations: Sabotage has been prohibited. (Espionage act, June 15, 1917.)

(5) Destruction of war materials: War materials have been defined and punishment provided for their destruction. (Act of April 20, 1918.)

(6) Explosives: Their manufacture, use, possession, and so forth, in time of war has been prohibited. (Act of October 3, 1917.)

(7) Patents: The Government is authorized during war to withhold patents detrimental to public safety. (Act of October 3, 1917.)

It will thus be seen that with the single exception of the control of transportation, which was inserted as a rider on the Army appropriation act in 1916, there exists no authority for a single one of the control agencies which I have indicated as necessary in order intelligently to mobilize industry in time of war.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. The gentleman has been an Assistant Secretary of War and is a distinguished Member of this House. Does he not believe that Congress ought to proceed now to legislate?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is what I am coming to. I am trying to impress upon the House that there is a great deal more vital legislation that is needed.

Mr. McSWAIN. Has the gentleman introduced any bill as yet? If he has not, I call attention to one that I have introduced—H. R. 3111.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I think I can satisfy the gentleman's feeling in that respect. I am just coming to that. There are pending before the House at the present time, as I was about to say, three bills—the so-called Johnson bill, the French bill, and the bill introduced by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]—seeking to confer upon the President the power to set up all of these controls, and to control and mobilize industry in time of war and also to stabilize prices. I believe the enactment of any one of these will tend to give us all the control required. It certainly should be our duty to write into law effective measures to crystallize the experience of the late war to prevent a repetition of the confusion, waste, delay, extravagance, and unnecessary cost, now so fresh in our minds but which is liable to be forgotten by those who follow. At least, provision should be made for the intelligent consideration of this whole subject by some commission or body charged with that duty, in order to induce action at the next session if not at this session. We give praise to the soldiers who died, but of our obligations to see that their sacrifices are not in vain, except in the limited field covered by the amended national defense act, not a single thing has been done in the legislative field to write into permanent law any of the lessons of the World War. As General Upton said in his masterly analysis of the military policy of the United States:

Battles are lost beneath the dome of the Capitol and in the Cabinet councils and the executive councils, but, however lost, it is the people who pay and the people who die.

Now, let me direct your attention to another phase of the question and give you some facts and figures showing what the people have paid and are paying for our folly in not having prepared industrially.

Treasury disbursements, as a result of the war, from April 7, 1917, to April 30, 1919, not including loans to our allies nor the normal expenses of the Government, amounted to $21,850,000,000. Quoting from Ayres's War with Germany:

The figure is twenty times the pre-war national debt. It is nearly large enough to pay the entire cost of our Government from 1791 up to the outbreak of the European war. Our expenditure in this war was sufficient to have carried on the Revolutionary War continuously more than a thousand years at the rate of expenditure which that war actually involved.

The expenditures by War Department bureaus were as follows:

	Expended to Apr. 30, 1919.	Per cent.
Quartermaster Corps:
Pay of the Army, etc.	$1,831,273,000	12.9
Other Quartermaster Corps appropriations	6,242,745,000	43.8
Ordnance Department	4,057,347,000	28.7
Air Service	859,291,000	6.0
Engineer Corps	638,974,000	4.5
Medical Department	314,544,000	2.2
Signal Corps	128,920,000	.9
Chemical Warfare Service	83,299,000	.6
Provost Marshal General	24,301,000	.17
Secretary's office and miscellaneous	33,367,000	.23
Total	14,244,061,000	100.00

Figures are for Dec. 31, 1918. Expenditures after that date were small.

War Department disbursements represent, therefore, about 64 per cent of the entire cost of the war. The total for the War Department alone about equals the value of all the gold produced in the whole world from the discovery of America up to the outbreak of the European war. During the first three months of the war expenditures for the entire Government were at the rate of $2,000,000 per day. During the next 12 months they reached $22,000,000 per day. For the final 10 months—up to April 30, 1919—they rose to $44,000,000 per day, or nearly $2,000,000 per hour. But these figures, which stagger the imagination, are only the beginning. The last figures prepared by the National Industrial Conference Board show that the purchasing price of the consumer's dollar, based on wholesale commodity prices compared with July, 1914, is now 60.9 cents; that is, 39.1 cents is now taken out of every dollar spent by a consumer as a tribute to the World War. If we consider the employer's dollar, we find its purchasing value for different commodities as follows: Newspaper printing, 54.1 cents; book and job printing, 45.7 cents; paper and wood pulp, 45.2 cents; foundries and machine shops, 47.2 cents; electrical apparatus, 45.9 cents; agricultural implements, 45.5 cents; automobiles, 45 cents; hosiery and knit goods, 45 cents; meat packing, 44.4 cents; chemicals, 44.4 cents; leather, 43.7 cents; furniture, 43.3 cents; boots and shoes, 41.5 cents; iron and steel, 41.2 cents; paper products, 41 cents; rubber, 40.8 cents; cotton—North, 38.2 cents; cotton—South, 32.2 cents; silk, 37.7 cents; wool, 34.6 cents.

The country has shown widespread interest in the President's proposal to reduce the tax burden of our people $300,000,000 annually. This represents just about one week's expenditure of the Government during any one of the last 10 months of the war.

That the Nation, that Congress, and even the Army had not realized the complexity and magnitude of the business side of war must be our excuse for the past. But for the future, what excuse can be offered if we permit a repetition of those errors which we now foresee and might avoid? As President Adams once said:

The national defense is the cardinal duty of the statesman.

What excuse will we have for neglecting our obligation under the Constitution to "provide for the common defense." [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent, Mr. WAINWRIGHT was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

NOTES ON INDUSTRIAL MOBILIZATION.

The national defense act, as amended June 4, 1920, establishes the broad outlines of a military policy for the United States. Under the provisions of this law the Army of the United States, consisting of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Reserves, is at present organized, trained, administered, and supplied. Congress, in amending the national defense act, made a fundamental change in the business organization of the War Department. The Assistant Secretary of War, under the supervision of the Secretary, is now charged with the control of policies affecting the business administration of the Army.

The duties of the Assistant Secretary of War are defined in section 5a of the national defense act. As prescribed therein he has two distinct functions: First, he is responsible for supervising the procurement of all military supplies for the War Department and other duties relating thereto; second, he is required to see that adequate provision is made for the mobilization of material and industrial organizations. The statute says he shall be charged with "the assurance of adequate provisions" for industrial mobilization, but this must be taken to mean that he is responsible that adequate plans are made.

Wars are no longer fought by the armed forces alone. Every man, woman, and child, every resource and every dollar in the entire Nation must throw its weight toward victory in time of war. Industry alone can not win a war; but it can lose a war by failing to supply the armies with munitions, vital to their fighting efficiency.

In planning for procurement of supplies in time of war, it is, of course, necessary to know what kind of supplies will be required, and how much will be needed. The General Staff indicates to the Secretary of War the military program which is believed adequate for any emergency and determines the types of equipment and tables of allowances. All questions affecting the procurement of supplies—that is, where they can be procured, who will procure them, the rate of production, and maintenance of an economical program—are determined under policies laid down by the Assistant Secretary of War, the business head of the War Department. The cost of the supply program must be estimated in order that Congress may know the extent of appropriations required and the Treasury Department may have the necessary data upon which to make plans for financing the war.

In this connection the War Department is giving most careful attention to the ways and means whereby profiteering may be controlled in time of war. The principle that the men at home shall not profit from war while their fellows are staking their lives and their health for their country is fundamental as a proposition of common justice. Such a policy was affirmed in a nation-wide referendum by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States during the World War and has been repeatedly commended as a principle of government by President Harding. It may, therefore, be regarded as a fixed national policy for the future.

An army requires hundreds of thousands of items of supply, many of which are a special design not produced commercially in time of peace. Before the War Department could approach industry in order to discuss production it was first necessary to standardize specifications for supplies wherever practicable. This has been done by adopting, as far as possible, commercial standards, thereby insuring quicker production and reduced costs. At the same time, it has reduced the large number of contract forms previously in use to one single form which is about to be adopted for all war contracts. The adoption of such a simple form should obviate many of the mistakes made in the World War by inexperienced buyers for the Government.

Plans for procurement do not stop with the determination of the finished article, but the War Department must go further and plan for the procurement of machines for the making of its matériel, for securing the necessary raw materials which might become critical in time of war, and for insuring an adequate supply of labor, of power, and of transportation facilities.

This phase of procurement planning goes beyond the strictly military features and merges into the broader field, which for want of a better term has been called "industrial mobilization." By this term we mean the conversion of the industrial effort of the Nation from peace production to war production in an orderly manner, so that supplies can be furnished promptly, economic losses minimized, and the return to normal economic conditions at the conclusion of the war facilitated.

In order that these plans may be complete it is necessary that the war requirements of the Navy, shipping, the railroads, and of the civilian needs be considered. Cooperation with the Navy will be accomplished by the recently created Army and Navy Munitions Board. It will be necessary in time of war to create an agency similar to the War Industries Board to coordinate the civilian demands with those of the Army and Navy.

The following indicates the steps which are being taken in working out a plan for the procurement of supplies for the War Department in time of war:

First. Having determined what will be required, it became necessary to figure out how much would be required. This necessarily depends upon the tables of allowances and the mobilization rate, which rate also determines when the supplies will be required.

Second. Having worked out in detail the amount of supplies required, it then became necessary to determine where and how they could be procured. This has been done by the establishment of procurement districts by each branch of the War Department, to each of which has been apportioned a proper share of the total requirements. A table showing the location of district headquarters for each of the procurement branches is attached hereto. In order to prevent competition among procuring branches, facilities requested by them have been tentatively allocated for the purpose of procuring the supplies required. The officers in charge of procurement districts are engaged during the present war in making a survey of establishments required to meet the supply program.

There are seven supply branches in the Army. The Quartermaster Corps is responsible for the procurement of all subsistence and forage, all clothing, personal equipment, tentage and general equipage, fuel, oil, paints, vehicles, harness and saddlery, hardware, stoves, tools, furniture, mess equipment, cordage, construction materials, motor vehicles, marine equipment, repair machinery, laundry machinery, and all animals.

The Ordnance Department procures rifles, pistols, machine guns, artillery and ammunition of all kinds, fire-control instruments, target materials, grenades, trench-warfare materials, pyrotechnics, special motor vehicles, tanks, and tractors.

The Signal Corps procures communication equipment of all sorts, wire and cable, radio equipment, batteries, photographic and meteorological equipment, and pigeons.

The Corps of Engineers procures surveying equipment, lithographic and map-making materials, searchlights, bridges, railroad rolling stock, railroad shops, lumber for troops in the fields, and water-supply equipment.

The Air Service procures all airplanes and balloons, the engines thereof, aircraft bombs, special raw materials which are needed for its aircraft, such as spruce and airplane dope. It also buys special trucks needed for its work, lubricants, aerial signaling apparatus, and special aircraft armament.

The Medical Department procures hospital supplies; surgical, dental, and veterinary instruments; drugs, chemicals, reagents, and laboratory supplies; and all hospital equipment and furniture.

The Chemical Warfare Service procures war gases and their containers, chemicals, smokes, incendiary materials, gas masks, and other gas-defense equipment.

Each branch has a distinct problem. We have those branches of which the Quartermaster Corps is the chief representative dealing in vast quantities of supplies, mostly commercial in character. On the other hand, we have the case of the Ordnance and Air Service dealing in items which are either not produced commercially in time of peace or in such limited quantities as to have little effect upon war-time procurement. With the first class (those dealing in commercial products) the problem is merely one of stimulating production for which peace-time facilities already exist. The main thing in this connection is to see that specifications follow as closely as possible commercial standards.

The problems facing the Ordnance Department and Air Service are peculiarly critical. In the case of the Ordnance Department, the maintenance of war reserves is vital. While at the present moment we are fairly well off in this connection, 10 years or even 5 years hence we probably will be in much worse shape, especially in the matter of explosives. Weapons of war change rapidly and it is very difficult to forecast 10 years in advance the types that will be required. It is very unlikely that Congress will ever consent to appropriate in time of peace sufficient money to maintain a war reserve which military men would like to have in order to insure a more rapid mobilization. There seems to be, therefore, but one thing to do in connection with the ordnance problem, and that is to secure sufficient appropriations annually to keep the art of manufacture alive. This will involve placing annually "educational" or "experimental" orders with selected facilities, furnishing them with the necessary jigs, dies, gauges, etc., in order to encourage them to experiment in the manufacture of these noncommercial articles.

The Air Service problem is even more critical. It is wholly dependent upon an infant industry which offers considerable hope for the future, but which at the present time is in bad condition due to lack of interest in commercial aviation. Congress is considering proposals to encourage civilian aviation, and through some legislative stimulus of flying, as well as the encouragement of mail service by airplanes, it is hoped to encourage aircraft production so that it may furnish some foundation for expansion for war-time requirements.

The chiefs of the supply branches have assigned various officers of the Regular Army to the duty of making continuous studies of the problems of procurement and submitting professional papers on the subject assigned. Several hundred officers are now making these studies in addition to their regular duties. Some reserve officers also have agreed to make similar studies.

The general idea is that for each class of supplies, of which there are about 10 in each branch, there will be a small group of Regular officers and a group of reserve officers who are studying the question from various angles; this will give to each procuring service a number of officers who are well qualified to carry out the responsibilities of the service in procurement matters. In this manner Regular officers will learn something of industry; reserve officers and others engaged in industry will become familiar with the military features involved, and all working together will be able to prepare the necessary detailed plans and keep them up to date to meet any changes in probable war needs or industrial progress. As the planning develops, critical features will become known and deliberate decisions can be made, the advice and judgment of men of great experience in industry being obtained on questions of major importance. The plans for expansion of personnel in time of war must go far beyond the personnel available in the Regular Army. By interesting reserve officers and patriotic civilians in this work, keeping them informed of the scope of the plans; and, in the case of reserve officers, calling them to active duty occasionally, a reserve of industrial staff specialists corresponding to the military reserve will be created. In this way the work of furnishing the expanded Army in an emergency with adequate supplies and munitions will proceed smoothly and without confusion as the work will be directed by men familiar with the war-time problem they are confronting and bring to it their special knowledge and training from civil life. Where the plans reach beyond the operations of the War Department in time of war and deal with such activities as were handled in the World War by the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Railroad Administration, and similar bodies the functions of the department are confined to making plans and keeping them up to date, based upon a thorough study of what happened here and abroad during the last war. Prominent men who had experience along these lines are called upon for advice. When war comes these plans will be submitted to the President for consideration. As above noted, the national defense act placed upon the Assistant Secretary of War the responsibility for preparing plans for mobilizing material and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs.

Some of the problems which will confront the Government and which must be solved by industrial experts are:

1. Capital: Finance manufacturers to whom war contracts have been allocated. Prevent profiteering. Stabilize prices in time of war.
2. Labor: Provide machinery for the settlement of industrial disputes in time of war. Insure a proper distribution of labor. Prevent the assumed necessities of industry becoming a haven for "slackers."
3. Facilities: Equalize the war load so that industries are neither overloaded nor made inactive. Determine what industries are less essential and provide for them in time of war. Plan conservation in industrial methods.
4. Raw materials: Provide for a constant flow of raw materials. Provide for the equitable distribution for the best interests of the Nation. Effect of tariff on strategic raw materials.
5. Power: Prevent overloading of districts to meet increased demands. Utilize power most economically.
6. Transportation: Maintain railroads and rolling stock in good condition. Obtain maximum efficiency in the use of rolling stock. Make best use of highways and waterways to supplement railroad transportation.

It is hardly necessary to point out what a tremendous saving a sound plan for industrial mobilization will be in time of war. During the World War the Government departments competed with each other and there was much confusion and lack of coordination. Some industries found themselves swamped with orders they were unable to fill, while other industries were ruined by a sudden cessation of their normal business. In a well-devised industrial mobilization scheme much of this can be avoided. This is a matter of vital importance to the taxpayers. The Army will be equipped for war months sooner than it was during the World War. The war will be shortened by just that much, thereby saving thousands of lives and billions of dollars. It will also mean a minimum dislocation of the normal economic effort and facilitate a return to peace conditions.

It is proposed that one or more of the supply branches have field agencies in the following cities: Atlanta, Baltimore, Birmingham, Boston, Bridgeport, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Dayton, Detroit, Jeffersonville, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, Schenectady, St. Louis. (From "Industrial Notes," issued by the Hon. Dwight F. Davis.)

AGENCIES ESTABLISHED FOR THE CONTROL OF INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES DURING THE WORLD WAR.

I. THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The Council of National Defense was created by an act of Congress April 29, 1916, and organized March 8, 1917. It was composed of the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, Agriculture, Commerce, and Labor, and functioned under the advice of its advisory commission.

It was the duty of the council "to make available to the United States the best thought and effort of American industrial and professional life for the successful prosecution of the war."

Due to lack of executive power in its advisory commission, its economic functions were transferred to the War Industries Board.

II. WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD.

Created July 28, 1917, by the Council of National Defense, the President made it a separate Executive agency May 28, 1918. Ultimate decision of all questions rested with the chairman. Functions of the board included: (1) Creation of new facilities; (2) conversion of facilities; (3) conservation of resources; (4) advice as to prices; (5) determination of priorities; (6) purchases for Allies. The board exercised its functions through committees, among which price-fixing, labor, requirements, priorities, conservation, and about 50 commodity committees.

MAJOR FUNCTIONS.

A. Computation of requirements: The requirements division was created March 27, 1918. It was furnished information regarding all contracts, purchases, and needs of the Supply Department. Requirements of the several services in both commodities and raw materials were computed under direction of the Purchase, Storage, and Traffic Division of the General Staff.

B. Priorities: Created originally to determine priority among orders given by the Government for war purposes. Extended activities to subcontractors. Under fuel control acts and the preferential shipment acts the Government was given power to withhold fuel and transportation from recalcitrant concerns. By classifying all work on hand and all industries into AA, A, B, C, or D classifications, much work became automatic. Finally included all commodities. Certificates for classes AA, A, and B were issued for all war work to assure preferential treatment.

C. Allocation of raw materials: Controlled by means of clearances issued by priorities division, War Industries Board, based on preference lists and information from commodity section.

D. Allocation of war orders to industry: Priorities division, War Industries Board, classified industry and plants by means of preference lists, rating them as to relative importance for war work. Plants so listed given preference in raw materials, labor, power, and transportation by clearances from priorities division.

E. Conservation measures: Commercial Economy Board, created under the Council of National Defense November 24, 1917; reorganized as the conservation division, War Industries Board. President's letter of March 4, 1918, reorganizing the War Industries Board, charged that body with "the conservation of resources and facilities by means of scientific, industrial, and commercial economies."

Methods: Trade associations agreed to reduction of consumption of raw materials up to certain percentages, after which agreement consumption of raw material was controlled through the priorities division, War Industries Board, by issue of certificates for supply of fuel, labor, and transportation.

F. Power: (See VII, p. 4, Control of power.)

III. CONTROL OF PRICES.

Exercised by the President under the following powers:

1. Pledge of all resources of the country by Congress in declaration of war.
2. Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.
3. Section 120, national defense act, authorizing the requisition of facilities.
4. Section 10, food and fuel act, August 10, 1917.

The power was exercised by the President in person, assisted by a price-fixing commissioner, and after March 4, 1918, by a price-fixing committee. Prices were usually fixed by negotiation with industry, assisted by cost-production facts collected by the Federal Trade Commission, the only limitation of law being that "just compensation should be paid in all cases."

IV. CONTROL OF FOREIGN COMMERCE.

War Trade Board (created under "trading with the enemy act"): Main function was to injure the enemy by restricting his trade and stiffening the blockade and to conserve shipping and commodities for American and allied use. It negotiated trade agreements with neutral countries, whereby these might receive their necessary imports from the United States without contributing to the strength of the enemy.

V. CONTROL OF FOOD.

Food Administration (created by the President of the United States under the food and fuel act of August 10, 1917).

Functions: Its functions were the conservation of food supplies by (a) control of commodities; (b) coordination of purchases, exports, imports, and transportation; (c) stimulating production.

Methods: Its methods of control were (a) educational campaigns, (b) voluntary agreements, (c) licensing and regulations, (d) minimum price guaranties, (e) cooperation with other Federal agencies.

Its control was exercised through and in cooperation with (a) United States Grain Corporation, (b) Sugar Equalization Board, (c) Collateral Commodities Committee, (d) Division of Coordination of Purchases, (e) War Trade Board, (f) Railway Administration, (g) United States Department of Agriculture, (h) War Department, (i) Navy Department.

VI. CONTROL OF FUEL.

Fuel Administration: Created August 23, 1917, under the food and fuel act. Organized into administrative distribution, and oil divisions. Administration was decentralized by the State administrators, who, with their various local committees, functioned in the State. The engineering committee developed a thorough system of cost accounting as a basis for price fixing by districts. Numerous conservation campaigns were carried on by the conservation bureau. A zone plan of distribution served to relieve the railroads by the elimination of cross-hauling. The bureau of production mapped out a program and brought production to a high point by the summer of 1918.

VII. CONTROL OF POWER.

The first power committee was organized under the Council of National Defense. In May, 1918, it became the power section of the War Industries Board. It made a survey of the power situation throughout the country, cooperated with the power companies, and distributed power in accordance with priorities where there was a shortage. It issued monthly summaries of the power situation.

VIII. CONTROL OF CAPITAL.

A. Capital Issues Committee: Authorized by Title II of the War Finance Corporation act to investigate, pass upon, and determine whether it was compatible with the national interest that there should be sold or offered for sale securities issued after April 5, 1918, by any person, firm, corporation, or association with an aggregate par value of $100,000. No statutory power was provided to enforce its decisions or mandates. Without voluntary cooperation of industries, it could have accomplished but little. Ceased to function December 31, 1918.

B. War Finance Corporation: Provided for by act of Congress approved April 5, 1918. Authorized capital stock, $500,000,000, all to be Government owned. Secretary of Treasury and four directors appointed by the President exercised control. Fundamental purpose of corporation was to furnish financial relief to essential industries affected by stringency of money market resulting from inflation of war business and flotation of Federal loans. Authorized to issue bonds in amount equal to six times paid-in capital. Functioned through financial organizations and cooperative industrial machinery, principally agricultural in character. Actual financial assistance rendered immaterial as compared with stabilizing effect of restoration of confidence at critical times and strategic points. A handy and efficient war agency continued to date with extended powers.

C. War Credits Board: Created by the Secretary of War November 20, 1917, under authority of act of October 6, 1917, permitting the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to make 30 per cent advance payments to contractors on "adequate security."

To December 31, 1919, the board authorized advances by supply departments aggregating $69,000,000. Secretary of Navy seems to have exercised this authority without the aid of a special board.

IX. CONTROL OF LABOR.

A. Selective service law: The exemption and deferment features of the selective service laws with the amendments, including the "Work or fight order," was an important factor in assuring a supply of labor in war industries. No Government control of labor was attempted until January, 1918.

B. Labor administration: Organized in January, 1918. Secretary of Department of Labor appointed labor administrator. His influence exerted mainly through the War Labor Policies Board, of which the Assistant Secretary of Labor was president, and through the United States Employment Service.

C. The United States Employment Service: This was expanded and became the sole recruiting agency for unskilled labor by Executive order, August 1, 1918. This was about to be extended to skilled labor at the close of the war.

D. War Labor Policies Board: Organized by labor administrator in spring, 1918, to coordinate and centralize the activities of the various labor boards and industrial services of the production departments of the Government. Policies involving distribution of labor, wages, hours, and working conditions.

E. National War Labor Board: With membership representing equally capital and labor organized by presidential proclamation, April 8, 1918, as an arbitration board, acted as a supreme court of industry. Could order a plant to be commandeered by the Government and could order the withdrawal of industrial deferments from the laborer.

F. War Industries Board: Indirect control of labor exerted through the issuing of preference lists. List of preferred industries which were favored by the Government in supplying labor, raw material, power, and transportation. Price fixing had not extended to labor at time of armistice.

X. CONTROL OF TRANSPORTATION.

A. Railroad Administration: Under authority of section I of the Army appropriation act approved August 29, 1916, the President, by a proclamation dated December 26, 1917, assumed possession and control of the railroads of the United States with the object of facilitating the transportation of troops, war material, and equipment. Control was exercised by the Railroad Administration, which was organized by the director general. The country was divided into several regions, each under a regional director. By Federal control act of March 21, 1918, Congress provided that by way of compensation each road should receive an annual sum equivalent to its average annual railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917, and that the properties taken over were to be maintained in as good repair and with as complete equipment as when placed under Federal control. After the Railroad Administration was organized and functioning the enormous traffic involved in the movement of troops, supplies, and war material was handled in a satisfactory and successful manner.

B. Inland water transportation: On June 15, 1917, the Council of National Defense created a committee on inland water transportation. On February 10, 1918, the records were turned over to a committee on inland waterways of the Railroad Administration. This became the division of inland waterways, Railroad Administration, on September 5, 1918.

The general purpose was to investigate and determine methods for increasing the use of inland waterways in order to relieve the railroads of a part of the traffic burden imposed upon them by war conditions. It also supervised the operation and construction of vessels for use upon inland waterways, such as the New York Barge Canal and the Mississippi and Warrior Rivers.

C. Ocean shipping: The United States Shipping Board was created under the Federal shipping act of September 7, 1916, for the purpose of regulating foreign and domestic shipping and promoting the development of an American merchant marine. The Emergency Fleet Corporation, authorized by the same act, was incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia on April 16, 1917, with a capital stock of $50,000,000, subscribed by the Shipping Board in behalf of the United States, organized for the "purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States."

The powers of both these agencies were enlarged during the war by emergency powers granted by presidential proclamation and war legislation. The trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation included all the members of the Shipping Board, so that the two together possessed all the power and authority of a Government agency, together with the capacity of a business corporation for prompt and direct action. They were concerned with practically every phase of the shipping problem which confronted the United States during the war.

XI. CONTROL OF COMMUNICATIONS.

A. Federal control of telegraphs, telephones, cables, and radio systems. Joint resolution of Congress, July 10, 1918. Authorized the President, as a war measure, to assume possession of and operate any and all telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio systems.

Telegraph and telephone systems placed under Federal control July 31, 1918, by proclamation of the President, July 22, 1918.

Cables taken over by proclamation of the President November 2, 1918, effective same date.

Radio stations needed for naval communications taken over by the Navy Department, per Executive order, dated April 6, 1917, and all other radio stations not needed for naval communications closed.

B. Censorship. Censorship Board.—Established by Executive order October 12, 1917, to censor communications by mail, cable, radio, etc., between the United States and foreign countries. It included representatives of the Secretaries of War and Navy, Postmaster General, War Trade Board; also the chairman Committee on Public Information.

Purpose: To prevent transmission of propaganda and the disclosing of information of military value.

C. Propaganda: Committee on Public Information created April 14, 1917, by Executive order, with Secretaries of State, War, and Navy as members and Mr. George Creel, chairman. It was the central agency for releasing news of Government activities and the distributing agency for educational work to support morale in the United States and allied and neutral countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, due to press reports concerning a matter that interests the Members probably but very little, I want to read the following letter that I sent to Inspector W. S. Shelby, of the police department of Washington:

MARCH 22, 1924.

Inspector W. S. SHELBY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of yesterday, marked personal but broadcasted by you in every newspaper in Washington, is received.

I never make any statement in Congress that I won't repeat to any man's face on the outside. I stand behind every statement I have made about you in the House or to you in committees.

When we passed the salary increases for police, I assured Congressman LARSEN and others opposing it that we had been promised "the best police force in the Nation," and that if you didn't make good on strict law enforcement, I would be the first to ask that your salary be abolished.

The Herald on March 17 quoted Mr. TINKHAM as saying that:

"Washington is 300 per cent more drunken than Paris and 2,000 per cent more murderous than London."

I felt shocked, because I believed our splendid Metropolitan police to be against both drinking and murder.

The Times on March 18 said:

"Representative TINKHAM's attack on the morals of Washington was supported by Inspector William S. Shelby, acting superintendent of police, yesterday."

And quoted you as saying:

"There is more lawlessness in the country than ever before. Liquor laws will never be enforced."

And the Times then said that you "blamed" prohibition for it, and said:

"Shelby favors a provision for the sale of light wines and beers, and the disposal of strong intoxicants under Government supervision."

I hoped that you would repudiate the press report. When you didn't, I then made my just comment in the House on March 19, which I now back up 100 per cent.

Altogether you spent several hours before our subcommittee on salary increases. The state statistics you persisted in reading in full had no application whatever to this bill. I then called your attention to complaints sent me that the unnumbered establishment on H Street NE., which should be "No. 406," as it is just between No. 404 and No. 408, was alleged to be dispensing intoxicating liquor daily, notwithstanding that it had been raided three times at long intervals by prohibition officers, it being reopened immediately after each arrest and deposit of bond. I asked you if you could not stop such continuous violations. I watched you carefully, and noted that you did not even take down the address and that you evidenced no interest whatever in the information.

Then, when our subcommittee on the Rathbone resolution met, you presumptuously insisted that the committee not interrogate any of the eyewitnesses to the shooting of Senator GARNER other than his wife. I had to call you down then and tell you that you should not presume to dictate to a committee of Congress. And when you then insisted on again reading in full your big file of state statistics and offered your gratuitous opinion that prohibition was the cause of crimes in Washington, I took issue with you again and told you that policemen could not enforce unless their superior officer believed in strict enforcement.

And I then asked you what you had done about the complaints against No. 406 H Street NE., and you admitted no arrest had been made and that the place had not been closed up. I told you then that complaints alleged that numerous boys went in and out of there every evening and night, and I again noted that you made no notation whatever of the address. I also then read you a letter giving the number of the property and street, the name of the owner, and his description, near the House Office Building, where liquor was said to be sold regularly, and I noted again that you did not seem interested and did not take down the name or address.

I noted also that at the time I proposed my amendment to grant all police and firemen a day off each week in lieu of Sunday you raised opposition, and I had to force it into the bill over your opposition. This made me think that you did not have properly at heart the interests of the 900 brave men under you who weather the rain, sleet, snow, dangers, and hot sun, performing their arduous duties.

Mr. Shelby, you must make good your promise that you would enforce the law and give us the best police force in the Nation. I pledged that promise to my colleagues when they withdrew opposition to the salary bill. For if you don't make good I shall ask that your salary be abolished.

But can you wonder that a United States Senator peacefully walking with his wife on the main street of Washington, within four blocks of the Nation's Capitol, is shot down by bootleggers who had loaded into their car there a "still" so large that they had to raise the car top, and in choosing an avenue of escape drove down historic "Pennsylvania" after the shooting, without a policeman interfering, when you, the acting inspector of the police department, publish in all Washington newspapers that you are for wine and beer, and that liquor laws will never be enforced, and that you support Mr. TINKHAM in asserting that Washington is 300 per cent more drunken than Paris and 2,000 per cent more murderous than London? Can you wonder, I ask you, that bootleggers become so bold with their stills and murderous assaults within four blocks of the Capitol?

I am sure that you are against murder. Then why not strictly enforce the laws against it? Even though you permit the Times to publicly say that you stand for wine and beer, why don't you strictly enforce the prohibition laws?

If Washington is so terribly drunken and murderous as Mr. TINKHAM and you assert, why don't you clean it up as Gen. Smedley Butler is doing Philadelphia? You seem to be in charge of law enforcement, or at least the statistical end of it. Why don't you enforce? But to do it you will have to learn to take down addresses when given to you.

I commend you for your rapid promotion since your Army experience in Virginia. For you have gone over the heads of many worthy captains here with long, faithful service. If you will enforce the laws here I will be your most ardent backer. But if you don't, I am going to be frank enough to tell you that I shall do everything within my power to have eliminated from the police force all impediments to strict law enforcement.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER].

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], who preceded me, spoke on the lessons to be learned from the Great War. During his discussion he quoted approvingly from the late President Harding's inaugural address that war should be fought without financial profit to any individual, corporation, or combination. Now, by a strange coincidence I follow him in a prepared address with my manuscript before me, the subject of which is, "The Harding Plan to Finance Future Wars."

There is no subject that has been before the people of this country that has received such universal indorsement as the subject of conscription of wealth for war purposes. I have pondered over this subject myself ever since the European war broke out. Upon our entrance into the world conflict I advocated it on the floor of this House and introduced bills to conscript war profits and to mobilize and conscript the labor of the country for war purposes. Since the war, by resolutions and speeches, I have repeatedly urged the appointment of a select committee to give this subject special study and to recommend legislation to Congress to conscript the material as well as the personal resources of the country in the event of another war.

A few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], in speaking on the Muscle Shoals bill and relating his connection with legislation resulting in the water power act of 1920, quoted the following from the German poet, Goethe: "What a man earnestly desires in his youth that shall he have in its fullness in his old age." I have earnestly desired and still desire with my whole soul action on the part of this Congress on this very vital subject; and, for the sake of the country and the people, I do not want to wait until my old age to realize in its fullness the consummation of a policy to conscript wealth as well as men in the event of another war.

The policy of conscription of wealth has been given mature and deliberate consideration by thoughtful men in all walks of life. At the beginning of our entrance into the late war over 400 teachers of political economy, public finance, and political science in the leading universities and colleges of the country jointly memorialized this Congress to adopt the policy of taxation rather than that of bond issues as the principal means of financing the expenditures of our own country in the war on which it had embarked.

I shall not take the time of the House to quote from or to discuss the principles set out in this memorial of American economists. Suffice it to say that our experiences in the war confirmed every statement of principle and of warning contained in that memorial. For the benefit of Members I shall have that memorial printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Since the war numerous patriotic, political, and commercial organizations have by resolutions urged and appealed to Congress to act. The American Legion in national convention has most earnestly called upon Congress for legislation. State Legion organizations, including my own State of Iowa, have unanimously appealed to Congress in favor of the universal draft in time of war of all available human and material resources of the country.

In 1922 the Iowa Republicans, in convention assembled at Des Moines, Iowa, incorporated the following plank in their platform:

We indorse the principle of universal conscription of material and personal resources, and urge such action on the part of Congress in times of peace as will automatically effect such result upon the declaration of war.

On the 27th day of February last the two Houses of Congress met in joint session in this Chamber to honor the memory of the late President Harding. This ceremony in his honor was most fitting and impressive. In no way can we honor the memory of the late President in a more effective manner than in the consideration of policies which he advocated for the welfare of our great country. On no proposition did the late President speak more earnestly or with more feeling or with a deeper sense of conviction than when he spoke of requiring all the resources of the Nation in the next war to serve without "one penny of war profit." Mr. Harding had ideals, but only ideals within the range of the practical and attainable were ever advocated by him. There was nothing of the impractical or the visionary in the make-up of Warren G. Harding. This great President, not only in one public address, but again and again and again, appealed to the country and to this Congress to make war profiteering impossible in the event of another war.

In order to remind you—"Lest we forget; lest we forget"—permit me to call to your mind again the stand of the late President on this vital question by quoting short excerpts from a few of his addresses. In his inaugural address, the first address he delivered as President, in outlining the policy of his administration for the conduct of war, if war is again forced upon us, he said:

If, despite this attitude, war is again forced upon us, I earnestly hope a way may be found which will unify our individual and collective strength and consecrate all America, materially and spiritually, body and soul, to national defense. I can vision the ideal republic, where every man and woman is called under the flag for assignment to duty, for whatever service, military or civil, the individual is best fitted; where we may call to universal service every plant, agency, or facility, all in the sublime sacrifice for country, and not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, corporation, or combination, but all above the normal shall flow into the defense chest of the Nation. There is something inherently wrong, something out of accord with the ideals of representative democracy, when one portion of our citizenship turns its activities to private gain amid defensive war while another is fighting, sacrificing, or dying for national preservation.

Out of such universal service will come a new unity of spirit and purpose, a new confidence and consecration, which would make our defense impregnable, our triumph assured. Then we should have little or no disorganization of our economic, industrial, and commercial systems at home; no staggering war debts; no swollen fortunes to flout the sacrifices of our soldiers; no excuse for sedition; no pitiable slackness; no outrage of treason. Envy and jealousy would have no soil for their menacing development, and revolution would be without the passion which engenders it.

This statement is clear and emphatic. The second paragraph of this statement is the strongest indictment of our inequitable and unscientific method of financing war that I ever read anywhere. In it he clearly pointed out what would be avoided if the next war were financed in the method outlined by him in the first paragraph. The things he hoped to avoid, as outlined in the second paragraph, were experienced in the late war. As the result of our method of financing the late war we had, and still have, "disorganization of our economic, industrial, and commercial systems at home." We have "staggering war debts"; we have "swollen fortunes to flout the sacrifices of our soldiers"; we had "sedition," "slackness," and "treason"; and in many countries passions engendered by the war led to bloody revolutions.

Now, I read to you from his address delivered at the Arlington Cemetery on Decoration Day, May 30, 1923:

The arguing veterans, 50 years after Gettysburg, on the scene of the world-famed combat, were thinking of industrial greed in the North and slave-owning greed in the South. But in reality their prejudices had been inspired by the hateful profiteering incident to war.

In all the wars of all time the conscienceless profiteer has put the black blot of greed upon righteous sacrifice and highly purposed conflict. In our fuller understanding of to-day, in that exalted consciousness that every citizen has his duty to perform, and that his means, his honor, and his life are his country's in a time of national peril, in the next war, if conflict ever comes again, we will not alone call to service the youth of the land, which has, in the main, fought all our wars, but we will draft every resource, every activity, all of wealth, and make common cause of the Nation's preservation. God grant that no conflict will come again, but if it does it shall be without profit to the noncombatant participants, except as they share in the triumphs of the Nation.

It will be a more grateful Nation which consecrates all to a common cause, and there will be more to share the gratitude bestowed. More, there will be a finer conscience in our war commitments and that sublimity of spirit which makes a people invincible.

On his fateful journey, from which he never returned, at Helena, Mont., on June 20, 1923, he spoke these earnest words:

I have said before, and I choose to repeat it very deliberately now, that if war must come again—God grant that it shall not—then we must draft all of the Nation in carrying on. It is not enough to draft the young manhood. It is not enough to accept the voluntary service of both women and men whose patriotic devotion impels their enlistment. It will be righteous and just, it will be more effective in war and marked by less regret in the aftermath, if we draft all of capital, all of industry, all of agriculture, all of commerce, all of talent and capacity and energy of every description to make the supreme and united and unselfish fight for the national triumph. When we do that there will be less of war. When we do that the contest will be aglow with unsullied patriotism, untouched by profiteering in any service.

Of course, we are striving to make conditions of foreign relations and so fashion our policies that we may never be involved in war again. If we are committed to universal service—that is, the universal commitment of every American resource and activity—without compensation except the consciousness of service and the exaltations in victory, we will be slower to make war and more swift in bringing it to a triumphant close. Let us never again make draft on our manhood without an exacting a draft on all we possess in the making of the industrial, financial, commercial, and spiritual life of the Republic.

[Applause.]

Let me call your attention, for the purpose of emphasis, to one sentence in the last paragraph where he said:

If we are committed to universal service . . . we will be slower to make war and more swift in bringing it to a triumphant close.

I am not going to say anything against other proposals that have been urged upon the American people to make wars less frequent, such as the League of Nations, the World Court, and others. It is my deliberate judgment, after studying all other plans, that if we adopt the plan for financing future wars so earnestly and eloquently advocated by the late President, it will do more to prevent wars and to insure continuing peace than any plan ever proposed by any man or organization in the wide world.

During the last session of Congress, in his message at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress on December 8, 1922, the late President made a direct appeal to this body for action. These are his words:

The proposed survey of a plan to draft all the resources of the Republic, human and material, for national defense may well have your approval. I commended such a program in case of future war in the inaugural address of March 4, 1921, and every experience in the adjustment and liquidation of war claims and the settlement of war obligations persuades me we ought to be prepared for such universal call to armed defense.

What heed has this body given to the proposal or plan of the late President to finance future wars? What heed has this body given, or will it give, to the late President's request for action by this body in one of his messages to the last session of Congress? Are we going to heed any of the lessons taught and impressed by our experiences in the late war? What do we propose to do now "to be prepared for such universal call to armed defense"? Or are we going to go on blindly and heedlessly, as other countries have, to our ruin and destruction in the event of another war? These are questions that this Congress is called upon to answer. These are questions that were submitted to us by the late President as head of the Nation and head of his party and on which he demanded most earnestly and most emphatically some action on the part of Congress. This Congress can not escape the responsibility of some action on this very vital issue. The safety and perpetuity of the Nation, the welfare of its people, and the security and happiness of coming generations are involved.

Gentlemen of the House, I am firmly convinced that conscription of wealth for war purposes is based on right, justice, and sound economic principles. Furthermore, I am convinced that the enactment of legislation to put such a policy automatically into effect upon a declaration of war by Congress would have a tendency to avert war, would reassure foreign nations of our unselfishness in international affairs, and in case war became unavoidable would guarantee a united and victorious America.

Inasmuch as the principle of conscription of human and material resources of the Nation for national defense has been universally indorsed by the people of the United States, it is now the duty of Congress to make the proposed survey of a plan as requested by the late President Harding, and to enact such legislation, or if necessary to make such changes in the fundamental law of the land, in times of peace as will automatically effect such a result upon the declaration of war.

What I seek is action by this Congress and I am not particular on whose resolution or on whose bill such action is predicated. What I want to bring about is the concentration of the best thought of this Congress and of the Nation on this proposition. In the two preceding Congresses I introduced resolutions for the appointment of a select committee to give this question study and report its findings and recommendations to Congress.

At the beginning of the present session of this Congress I introduced a resolution (House Concurrent Resolution No. 1) providing for the creation of a joint commission to be known as the Joint Commission on National Defense to consist of five Senators and five Representatives to investigate and report to Congress the best and most practical plan for drafting all the resources of the United States, human and material, for national defense in the event of future wars.

The conscription of all the resources of the Nation, both human and material, is a big and very complex proposition. It extends beyond the jurisdiction of any one of the standing committees of either House of Congress. It is a subject that covers every activity of the people—labor, agriculture, industry, finance, business, and others. The committee or commission authorized to investigate this subject should have wide powers, including the power to call before it the best experts of the country both in and out of the Government service. To go into this question thoroughly will involve the expenditure of some money, which no committee of either House of Congress can do without special authorization.

For the reasons I have urged I am firmly convinced that those of the membership of the House who believe as I do should get back of my proposal, or a similar proposal, to create a joint commission, made up of Members of both the Senate and the House of Representatives. The creation of such a commission would at once attract wide public attention and assure the people of the country of the earnestness of Congress in the matter. Such a commission would become the clearing house of the Nation for everyone who has valuable suggestions and concrete proposals to present. The existence of such a commission would put everybody to thinking—its effect would be good and, I believe, would lead to legislation that would tend to lessen wars; and in event war became unavoidable it would mean that the war would be fought and financed with equity to all and without war profits to the few.

Every lawyer is familiar with this maxim in equity: "Equity will not suffer a wrong to be without a remedy." Everybody concedes the wrong in our system which permits a portion of our citizenship to turn its "activities to private gain amid defensive war while another is fighting, sacrificing, or dying for national preservation." The wrong in the system is conceded. To find the remedy and apply it in future wars is the duty of statesmanship. [Applause.]

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WEFALD. I have been very much interested, as I always am when the gentleman is speaking, and I am one of those that are continually seeking light. I would like to know if the gentleman can tell me what the reason can be that he can deliver a speech here to-day and read quotations from a speech by the late President and be applauded, when a few short years ago a man in my State said practically the same words and had to serve a time in prison for it. What is the reason for this change in the opinion?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Whatever the reason for the change may be, the gentleman will certainly concede that the change is wholesome.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is it not a fact that the gentleman following me on this theme is a matter of pure coincidence?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Absolutely. I did not know that the gentleman was going to speak until he was yielded time, and I did not know what he was going to discuss until I heard him speak.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. To what committee have these resolutions been sent?

Mr. RAMSEYER. My resolution is pending before the Committee on Rules. It is for the purpose of creating a joint committee or commission to give the subject special study and to recommend legislation to Congress.

Mr. McSWAIN. Has the gentleman been unable through two or three Congresses to get action upon such a resolution?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I appeared before the Rules Committee during the last Congress and was unable to get any action. I intend to appear before that committee at an early date and insist upon action. I think this is the way to study the question. I understand the gentleman has a similar resolution. Is the gentleman's resolution pending before the Committee on Rules?

Mr. McSWAIN. My resolution is pending before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Last year my resolution to the same effect was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I followed it up by having hearings upon it. My resolution is Resolution No. 128. We are now having hearings upon it before the Committee on Military Affairs, and have been for three weeks. I announced in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the day, the hour, and the room number, and we would be very glad to have anybody in Congress or in the United States come before us upon the subject.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman's resolution provide for the creation of a committee or a commission?

Mr. McSWAIN. It does.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Of course I do not know just what the Committee on Military Affairs is doing or can do, because the Committee on Rules is the committee that has jurisdiction over the subject for the creation of special commissions or committees.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. In view of the tenor of the gentleman's speech, I am wondering why the gentleman made such a statement as to say that the conscription of wealth automatically on the declaration of war would tend to avert the war. Will not the gentleman state that such a provision would practically stop all war?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I made the statement that it would do more to avert wars than any proposal that has yet come from any source. Maybe it will do as much as is suggested in the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith for printing in the RECORD:

1. House Concurrent Resolution No. 1, referred to in the course of my address.

2. Memorial of American economists to Congress regarding war finance. I wish to say in regard to this memorial that it was submitted to Congress during the month of April, 1917. At the time I had it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I regard this memorial as the ablest document on war finance that was presented to Congress during the late war. It should be read and reread by every student of finance. Our experiences in the war confirm every statement of principle and of warning in that memorial:

1. House Concurrent Resolution 1.

Resolved, by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint commission is hereby created, to be known as the Joint Commission on National Defense, which shall consist of five Senators, three of whom shall be members of the majority party, and two of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives, three of whom shall be members of the majority party, and two of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be appointed by the Speaker.

Said commission shall investigate and report to Congress, on or before the first Monday in December, 1924, the best and most practical plan for drafting all the resources of the United States; human and material, for national defense, so that in event of future war every man and woman may be called under the flag for assignment to duty for whatever service, military or civil, the individual is best fitted; and every plant, agency, and facility may be called to universal service, all in sublime sacrifice for country, and not one penny of war profit shall inure to the benefit of private individual, corporation, or combination.

The commission shall include in its report recommendations for legislation which in its opinion will tend to carry out the purpose of this resolution, and shall specifically report upon the limitations of the powers of Congress in enacting such legislation.

The commission shall elect its chairman, and vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

The commission or any subcommittee of its members is authorized to sit during the sessions or recesses of Congress, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such personal services and incur such expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of this resolution; such expenditure shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives in equal proportions upon vouchers authorized by the commission and signed by the chairman thereof.

2. MEMORIAL OF AMERICAN ECONOMISTS TO CONGRESS REGARDING WAR FINANCE.

We, the undersigned, teachers of political economy, public finance, and political science in American universities and colleges, respectfully urge upon Congress to adopt the policy of taxation rather than that of bond issues as the principal means of financing the expenditures of our own country in the war on which it has embarked.

The taxation policy is practical. It will prevent the price inflation which must result from large bond issues. It is demanded by social justice. It will increase the efficiency of the Nation in the conduct of the war.

The argument in support of these statements is briefly as follows:

THE TAXATION PLAN IS PRACTICABLE.

The taxation policy is practicable because the current income of the people in any case must pay the war expenditures. The choice between bond issues and taxation is merely a choice whether the Government shall take income with a promise to repay those who furnish it or take income without such promise. The actual arms, munitions, and other equipment and supplies for use in the war, except to the small extent that they have been stored up in the past, must be produced now, during the war itself, not after the war, and, moreover, must be produced by our own people. The policy of borrowing within the country itself does not shift any part of the Nation's burden of war expenditures from the present to the future. All it does is to make possible a different distribution of the burden among individuals and social classes, to permit repayment to certain persons who have contributed income during the war by other persons after the war. If the people can support the war at all, they can do it on a cash basis. Borrowing creates nothing. Except by borrowing abroad, which we can not do, we can get nothing which we do not ourselves produce.

It may be necessary for a month or two at the outset to issue a limited amount of bonds pending the collection of increased taxes, but beyond these, which might well be made repayable within a year, no necessity for bonds exists.

TAXATION PREVENTS PRICE INFLATION.

The taxation policy and no other will enable the country to escape the enormous evils of further inflation. The present high level of prices in Europe and America is primarily due to the war bonds and the paper money issued abroad. If the United States joins on a huge scale in this policy of borrowing, prices are bound to become far higher still.

Price inflation is harmful even in times of peace. During a war it is disastrous. It increases the cost of conducting the war. It postpones victory and thus adds to the war's toll of lives as well as to its money expenditures. By every bond issue the Government enhances the prices it must pay and thus creates the need of more bonds. The policy works against itself.

Moreover, inflation of prices works injustice between different classes of society. The burden rests chiefly upon wage earners and salary receivers, whose pay never rises as fast as prices, and upon those who receive fixed or contractual incomes. The hardship which millions of our people are already suffering from the increased cost of living will be made manifold greater if the Government issues billions of dollars of bonds to finance the war.

The manner in which bond issues inflate prices may be briefly explained. The bond policy increases the amount of bank credit, which is equivalent in effect, to an increase in the currency.

For example, if the Government takes $1,000 from a man in taxes, his credit or purchasing power is lessened to the same extent as the Government's is increased. On the other hand, if the Government borrows $1,000 from him, the quantity of purchasing power in existence is greatly increased. He now has a bond worth $1,000 on which he can and very often will borrow at the bank. Say he borrows $800; he lend him $800 the bank does not have to give up 800 actual dollars. Instead, it gives him a deposit account of $800, and, inasmuch as most of those who present checks do not ask for actual cash but have their checks credited to their deposit accounts, the bank can keep this $800 in checks floating by setting aside, say, only $200 of actual cash. In other words, this bond issue transaction has resulted in increasing the Government's credit by $1,000 in decreasing the man's credit by only $200, and in decreasing the bank's money by only $200; that is, there has been a net increase of credit currency—checking deposit accounts—of $800, in contrast with no net increase if taxes had been adopted instead of bonds.

If the man had given up his money in taxes, he would have ceased to compete with the Government and other buyers of commodities and labor to the extent of $1,000; but when the Government gives him a bond for his payment, he is still enabled to compete to the extent of $800. The purchasing power of society as a whole has increased by $600. This inevitably forces up prices.

The above illustrates the result of a bond issue that is taken by the public. As a matter of fact, if bonds are issued, a large part of them will be taken by banks. It is likely that the Federal reserve banks will buy these bonds wholesale by giving the Government checking accounts to the extent of the bonds. This causes immediate inflation to the full amount of the checking accounts thus created; that is, inflation to 100 per cent instead of to 60 per cent of the bond issue, as outlined in the illustration above.

As the Government draws checks on these bank accounts to meet its requirements, the banks will try to recoup themselves by retelling the bonds to the public. To the extent that they succeed, the bonds get into the hands of the ultimate investor, with the resulting inflation already described. In so far as the banks are unsuccessful in this distribution, they are almost certain to issue bank notes on the basis of bonds left in their hands, and these notes will cause inflation even worse than that due to the checking accounts of the public based on bond collateral.

JUSTICE DEMANDS THE TAX POLICY.

The policy of taxation for war expenditures is demanded by justice. Apart from the injustice arising from price inflation, the policy of paying for the war by bond issues gives property a preference over life; it deals unjustly as between citizen and citizen. The question of taxation versus bonds is not merely one of economics; it is one of morals, of right against wrong.

This war is a great social enterprise. The American people have undertaken it as a people. The future welfare of the country as a whole is involved; the future welfare of every citizen is involved. It is the duty, therefore, of every citizen to share in war's burdens to his utmost. For some the duty is to fight; for others to furnish money. For all the duty is without limit of amount. The citizen who contributes even his entire income, beyond what is necessary to subsistence itself, does less than the citizen who contributes himself to the Nation.

The man who goes to the front can not be paid back the life or the limb he may lose. The man who stays at home should contribute his just share of the money cost without expectation of repayment. That the soldier or sailor who gives himself to his country should, if he be so fortunate as to return, be taxed to pay interest and repay principal to him who has contributed the lesser thing—money—is a crying injustice. If conscription of men is just and right, conscription of income is the more so; conscription of both is just and right when the Nation's life and honor are at stake.

TAXATION WILL INCREASE WAR EFFICIENCY.

The policy of taxation for war expenditures will increase the efficiency of the Nation in the war. Its effect in keeping down the cost of the war has already been pointed out. Its effect on the spirit of the people is still more important. The general recognition of the justice of requiring everyone, according to his ability, to share the burdens of war will bind the people together; the sense of injustice in the policy of borrowing will tend to drive them apart, to array class against class. Our soldiers and sailors will fight loyally in any case, but their spirit will be the more indomitable if they feel that every man who stays at home is serving the country to the utmost with his substance. An America in which every citizen, without discrimination, is called upon to do and to give all that he can, all that his powers permit, will be a united America, and a united America is bound to be victorious.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CANFIELD]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to direct my remarks to the agricultural situation that is facing the Nation, a question which I consider second to none in importance at this time. We have heard several very able speeches on the floor of this House about the wheat farmers of the West and Northwest, and a few have spoken about the farmers of our country in general. While it is true the wheat farmers of the West and Northwest are entitled to consideration, I feel that the farmers in other parts of the country are also justly entitled to consideration, as I find them everywhere in a distressed condition, and I see no reason why this Congress should not consider some of the many agricultural questions that are being brought before it, and do everything within its power to see that the farmers of our country, who at the present time are facing a deplorable situation, are given the consideration to which they are justly entitled and be put in position so they can at least expect to make a fair living after putting forth their effort for from 12 to 18 hours a day on the farm almost every day in the year.

There is at the present time and there has been for the last two or three years much unrest and uncertainty in the minds of our farmers, due to the fact that when they put in their crop they have no way of knowing whether or not they will be able to get their cost of production. This condition as you all well know should not exist and it is time that this Congress should take up this question and find out why it exists and do everything within its power to restore the farmers of our country to their proper place and put them in position to again receive a just compensation for the efforts put forth by them.

Many millions of people who reside on the farms in our country find themselves, as we are informed, in an intolerable situation and they are demanding, and I think rightly so, that they be given some consideration, for this condition can not go on as it is at the present time.

There can be no lasting prosperity in trade and industry unless the farmer is reasonably prosperous, and neither can we expect the farmer to be willing to put forth his every effort as long as he harbors the resentful feeling that he is not accorded a square deal.

Not only is the farmer entitled to relief from his present conditions, which place him at a big disadvantage as compared to men in other walks of life, but the continuance of these conditions can not help but cause a very serious condition to prevail throughout our country.

We can not expect the farmer to remain satisfied and contented with his conditions over which he has no control when the purchasing power of his dollar is only worth one-half what it formerly was, or, in other words, when it takes twice as many bushels of wheat or corn to buy a plow, wagon, harness, or the clothing that is necessary for him to buy.

The President called attention to the economic distress that disturbs agriculture and the financial condition of the farmer in his first message to Congress; while calling attention to the acute agricultural situation that has resulted in bankruptcy and bank failures all over the farming sections of the country he did not discuss the causes that have led to the deplorable change in the condition of the people engaged in the farming industry and neither did he propose any remedy except more diversification, and, as I remember, an extension of credit. A few years ago the farmers were admitted to be prosperous, but to-day it is quite the contrary.

At present the Indiana farmer is selling his principal products at pre-war prices or lower and is buying his supplies at about double pre-war prices, and this has been the situation most of the time since the war. For example, fat hogs are now selling for less than 7 cents per pound on the farm, and Indiana farmers sold their wheat at threshing time for about 80 cents per bushel. Both these figures are below pre-war prices and much below cost of production. Corn, the other leading product of Indiana farms, is largely marketed through hogs and cattle to which it is fed, and the amount of money the farmer realizes for his corn crop is represented more in the price of hogs and cattle than in the market price of corn.

On the other hand, when the farmer buys the clothing, fuel, building material, agricultural implements, transportation, and other things he must have he is compelled to pay double pre-war prices, and when he goes to pay his taxes he pays on more than a double pre-war basis. It does not take a mathematician to figure out that the farmer can not long continue to sell at pre-war prices and buy at double pre-war prices.

As a matter of fact, many of our Indiana farmers have already reached their limit in this connection and are going bankrupt. In the leading agricultural counties in Indiana within the last 90 days quite a number of the very best and heretofore considered most substantial farmers have failed and many others are sure to follow unless conditions improve rapidly.

Within the past two years thousands of farmers have found it impossible to make a living on the farm and have given it up as a bad job. These same things are happening all over the country, and I wish to impress upon you with all the earnestness at my command that the agricultural situation is in an extremely critical condition and demands immediate and effective treatment.

Many bills have been introduced at this session of Congress that have for their purpose giving relief to the great agricultural interests of our country, or, a better way to say it would be, to give relief to the distressed farmers of our country, and I have made it a point to give much study to the different bills that have been introduced, and have attended the meetings that have been called to discuss the different plans that are proposed in the different bills, but I am very much afraid with possibly the exception of one plan none of the plans introduced so far can be worked out in the interest of the farmer without being amended in many ways, due to the fact that the expenses of the Government are continually increasing. Government employees are demanding increased compensation, and most of the plans will call for hundreds of extra Government employees at a large increased expense to the Government.

Even though the conditions of our farmers are deplorable, they can be made much worse than they are at the present time by adoption of dangerous methods of relief under the theory that it is the best proposition proposed, and that while it is not everything that could be desired, still it promises something. This, in my mind, would be a very poor excuse for voting for a measure that might result in untold injury to an industry which is now almost prostrate, and if a plan can not be worked out that we know positively will give relief we should take up this great question and work it out from an entirely different angle.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my opinion there are three big questions that should be considered at this time, and when they are taken care of and adjusted in the interest of all the people, instead of in the interest of the "special privileged classes," then, and not until then, will the desperate condition in which our farmers find themselves at the present time be improved.

The three questions that I feel should be considered at this time and adjusted without delay are:

The present high protective tariff;

The transportation question, especially in so far as it affects the distribution of agricultural products; and

Our foreign relations policy.

It is said that our present high protective tariff law, known as the Fordney-McCumber tariff law, costs the average American farmer with a family of five $159 more annually than the benefit he receives from it.

A number of estimates of the cost of the tariff to farmers have been made, and one of the most conservative estimates that I have ever seen shows the extra cost of the tariff on dutiable commodities bought by the farmers is increased by import duties to the extent of some $426,000,000 and the gains to farmers as producers by tariff in all parts of the country are $125,000,000, which makes a net loss to the American farmers of $301,000,000.

It has well been said that "the cob is the farmer's share," and as conditions are to-day, when the farmer produces a bushel of corn and shells it, the part he gets is the cob and the other fellow gets everything else.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as long as this condition prevails and the laws of our country are favorable to the "special interests" or "privileged classes" I see no way for the farmers to prosper or in any way for his present condition to even be improved.

The transportation question should also be given prompt attention. There should be an immediate adjustment of freight rates on the agricultural products of our country. I contend that the rates on all food products should be lowered at once, as agricultural freight rates are at present out of their normal pre-war rates and should be readjusted. The present high rates on other articles that are not so essential will more than take care of the reduction on food products and still enable the railroads of the country to make large profits on their real investments.

The railroads have attempted to prove by figures that they can not reduce freight rates on agricultural products, but we find them before the Interstate Commerce Commission asking permission to make a reduction in their coast-to-coast rates. So there is no question but what the freight rates of farm products can be reduced, and when they are reduced it will be a great help to the American farmer.

Third and last, but not least by any means, I think that the farmer needs the consuming units abroad for his products who are able to pay a price for his surplus.

Under the unfortunate condition which exists at the present time, this country has abandoned its relations with other nations and the market for the surplus produced on the farms of this country is cut off, to the detriment of our farmers. Whenever we abandon our present policy and do our part toward the nations which consume our surplus food products, then we will have done much in the matter of helping our farmers to better their condition, for it is the market for the surplus produced by the farmer that makes a real profit possible.

When all these things are accomplished, gentlemen, and the farmer is placed upon an equal basis with the rest of the business world, then will the American farmer by organization and cooperation be able to see success and prosperity ahead.

We hear much criticism coming from certain interests because the farmers are seeking relief through congressional action. I feel that our farmers are not asking for Government favors, but for a square deal, and that he has a right to ask for it, and if he does not get it he will see that men are placed in the next Congress that will see that his interests are looked after.

Gentlemen, the prosperity that others enjoy can not long endure if agriculture does not prosper, and it is up to the business and financial interests to immediately commence to cooperate with the farming interests of our country or the prosperity others are enjoying and the foundation for all permanent national prosperity will be destroyed.

As I stated before, I feel that the three questions that must be taken up and settled before our farming conditions can be improved to any great extent are tariff, transportation, and foreign relations. Congress is in position to take up these three great questions and regulate and adjust them, and when Congress does this our farmers will have relief.

If any of you should have a sick child and you were to call a doctor, the first thing he would do would be to find out what caused the troubled condition before he prescribed the remedy. This country has a very sick member in its family. I have pointed out to you the cause of the trouble and firmly believe I have prescribed the remedy by which this Congress can relieve the deplorable condition of our farmers.

It is my hope and wish, gentlemen, that this Congress will take up these questions and pass legislation at once that will result in giving to the farmers a new lease on life and prosperity and give them an opportunity to regain financial independence, and when this is accomplished the prosperity of our Nation will have a firm foundation on which it can stand. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN]. [Applause.]

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, according to the press perhaps there never was in the history of this country a greater wave of crime sweeping over it than during the past few years. Only this week we are told by the press that in one department of the Government under the present administration there have been discharged from the service within two years nearly 800 employees, all of whom were discharged on account of theft and graft. That is in the Department of the Treasury. It appears further that a majority of those persons who have attempted to graft and steal from their Government in its trying hours of need have gone without punishment; that the amounts stolen have been repaid by bonding companies. It is not only true that graft has existed in the Treasury, but very much to our humiliation and shame it has existed in many other departments of this Government; for instance, in the Veterans' Bureau, in the Department of Justice, in the Department of the Interior, and perhaps in other departments. Every day new evidence comes to us that some one is grafting. It is usually some man occupying a high position. This is a very serious situation. If the employees of the Government can not be trusted with its funds the Republic can not exist. Are the taxpayers to be burdened with the payment of taxes that are to be stolen by public officials? Something should be done to protect them. In this connection I want to say another thing while it occurs to me, and that is that not only are these grafting public officials escaping punishment but men occupying high places in the business world, who make it a daily practice, if we are to believe the press, to induce these poor Government officials to violate their oath of office and to prove unfaithful to their trust, are guilty of grave crimes and should be punished. Every time the President has been before this body for the last two or three years we have been asked to do something to encourage business. I am in favor of legitimate business, gentlemen, but I want to say to you that much of the kind of business and the kind of business methods that we are tolerating in America to-day should wash its dirty linen. It is these business men in high places with great funds who are corrupting the poor Government officials.

I think it is not only the duty of this Government to see that the officials who yield to temptation are punished, but that business men who cause them to commit these crimes should be punished also. [Applause.] It is all right to sing, "Yield not to temptation, for yielding is sin," but it is time we had a new song entitled "Tempt not to corruption, for corrupting is sin." There is one sad thing to me in reading the Bible; when we get to poor old Judas the Bible does not even tell who it was that gave him the 30 pieces of silver to betray his Christ, but Judas from that time to this has been held up to ridicule and scorn. Judas as a man was far better than some of those we have trusted in public positions because he had enough decency to commit suicide. Some of the rascals now at large in this country have not even that much decency. [Applause.] I want to call your attention to what, in my judgment, is a kind of slow train moving over the Government's highway at this time. There was evidence before this House, before the Senate, and before the country that a high official, occupying a position in the Veterans' Bureau, was guilty of graft and guilty of almost every crime except murder that one could think of in the discharge of a public trust, but some two years passed before anybody seemed to take much notice of it. Finally when the President of the United States had to force the man to resign, what was done? Not a thing. The President of the United States, knowing that he was a crook and a criminal, the Department of Justice knowing that fact, yet he was permitted to roam at large from one end of this country to the other and in foreign countries without even an effort to arrest or to apprehend him, and without being prosecuted. I refer to Charles R. Forbes, late Director of the Veterans' Bureau. I believe, gentlemen, that he never would have been arrested and that he never would have been indicted except for the investigation of the department over which he presided, and which I obtained through a Senate committee. Yet at this time we are told that the President is getting tired of investigations. Well, gentlemen, I am satisfied he has some reason for being tired of investigations. But I doubt the policy of ceasing investigations so long as they disclose corruption, graft, and wrongdoing. [Applause.] I am for exposing graft and wrongdoing, not because I am not a member of the majority party, which happens to be carrying the burden at this time, but because I believe that it means the good of this country and the protection of this Republic. What is being done by the administration or the Department of Justice to punish crime or to suppress it?

In the early days of January I wrote to the Attorney General, and I made a speech on the floor of this House demanding that these crooks and criminals and grafters be punished. After several days of delay I was assured by a polite letter from that high official that he had appointed a distinguished attorney who would push those cases to which I referred immediately. Now, what has been done? Some parties are in foreign lands; even Sweet, the secretary to Mr. Forbes, appears to be a fugitive from justice at this time. No effort has been made to bring him back to this country for trial, and none will be. He flatly refuses to return. If he has committed no crime, he knows full well that crime was committed, how it was done, and who committed it. He was at least needed as a witness and could have been kept for the purpose, but no effort was made to do it.

The wealthy and politically prominent who commit crime are no better to be punished than are the poor and insignificant who violate the law.

Now, let us see who the gentleman is that is charged with the prosecution of these crooks and criminals. Mr. John W. Crim, an ex-assistant attorney in the Department of Justice, whose salary supposedly was about $7,500 a year. For some reason he suddenly decided to resign, ostensibly for the purpose of retiring into private practice, but he is given the place of special attorney to prosecute these crimes at a salary of $1,000 per month.

Now, mind you, the salary is by the month. Gentlemen in private practice usually take cases for a stipulated amount; but Mr. Crim, appointed on the 15th of December, 1923, entered upon his service the following day, December 16, 1923, at $1,000 per month. And what has he done? Indicted two men, and that is all, except to draw a salary of more than $3,000.

Why, the testimony was already in print. He had it before him, and any man who was a half-way lawyer could have been prepared to go before the grand jury in one week. What does Mr. Crim say now? Although the papers said, when Mr. Forbes had been indicted, that the grand jury would be called together in another place at an early date, and that other parties would be indicted, but what does he say? Mr. Crim says, "Oh, no. I can not call the grand jury together in other districts where crimes were committed until I get through with the prosecution of those that I have already indicted." "When will they be tried, Mr. Crim?" "Oh," says Mr. Crim, "I hope to get a trial some time during April."

When, in the name of God, gentlemen, will this magnificent attorney, who is paid by the taxpayers $1,000 per month, ever finish prosecuting the grafters in the Veterans' Bureau? The cases will be soon barred by the statute of limitations. The district attorney of my own district was until recently, if not now, paid $3,500 a year. He is a real prosecuting attorney, a trial lawyer, a man of ability. He tries something like 700 or 800 cases a year. What is true of that district is true also of almost every other district in the United States. There is hardly a district, I take it, in the whole United States where 500 or 600 criminal cases are not tried within a year. And yet Mr. Crim, drawing $1,000 a month, on the job since December 16, 1923, has indicted only two men. The rest are going at large, and no grand jury is impaneled to indict them.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. You remember the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KINO] was that this same Mr. Crim, either ignorantly or purposely, failed to draw the indictment in the harness case properly, so that all the parties who should have been indicted to establish the case were not indicted, and the case fell down?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes. I remember that. Thank you for bringing it to our attention.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. The newspaper reports show that that is about the same situation as the case in Chicago.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Is not the gentleman afraid that the local district attorneys are underpaid?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Probably they are. Some of them may be underpaid. But they get their per diem allowance and their expenses, and there is no law under the sun that forces them to serve against their own will. We will never have any trouble in getting good, efficient district attorneys throughout the country.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Does not the gentleman think that all this talk about tax reduction is an effort to draw a greenback across a crime trail?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. That may be.

Now, why was Mr. Crim employed? Why was not General O'Ryan employed? He was more familiar with it and developed it before the investigating committee. It may be that he was too good a lawyer. It may be in view of the press statements of to-day that he was employed for a special purpose. It may be that the hurried visit of our Attorney General to Chicago, according to statements appearing in the press of to-day, and his appearance before the grand jury there, amounts to more than grave suspicions concerning the commission of crime involving the Attorney General himself, along with some Members of this House. It may be that Mr. Crim was put in there because they knew he could not write an indictment, and because they knew he ran a slow train and would not overtake a criminal. This may also explain why the grand jury is not convened in another place.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The Attorney General has been given an opportunity to appear before the grand jury, and yet Members of this House were denied it.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes; that is true also.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to another very sad condition existing in this Government, and that is that men who are shown to have been unfit for public service, if not guilty of crime, in connection with the investigation of the Veterans' Bureau, are allowed to remain in official positions and on the pay roll of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I regret that I am so hard pressed now for time that I can not.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I can get through in five minutes if the gentlemen can let me have that much.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would like to give the gentleman five minutes, but I realize that it would cut somebody out.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Give me three minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I want to show what kind of men are employed in this Government. Here is a letter written by an employee to Mr. W. C. Black, now in the employ of the Veterans' Bureau. Mr. Black is a man who was, it seems, clothed with full authority to employ and discharge men; and yet receives a letter like this and never called in the man from the field to discharge him, or to investigate, or report his act. When the investigating committee permits it to be read into the record, he simply whines that it was written to him in a personal way and that some one slipped, or stole it from his office. Mind you, "his office," the Veterans' Bureau.

Let me read it (pages 701-702 of the record of the investigation):

MY DEAR MR. BLACK: Just a line to thank you for sending our checks. Evans leaves to-night for D. C., after loading around here for the past week. Say, this is some town. You are missing the real old times. Hunting season is on—rabbit dinners, pheasant suppers, wines, beers, and booze—and, by God, we haven't missed a one yet. Collins and I get invitations to 'em all. Last Wednesday I was soused to the gills on rabbit, etc. Last Saturday, wines—Oh, boy! New Jersey is "dry," but Ohio—you pronounce it O-H-I-O—and these fellows here are some "treaters." We eat and wine with the mayor, the sheriff, the prosecuting attorney.

To hell with the central office and the work. And the fun is in the field—'tis all the work I want—just travel around. Say, Dexter, I think, is on the "rocks," and unless Forbes changes the administration, the school will be. I see the handwriting on the wall. We occupy the cottage of General ——. Pay rent and "heat."

The school has a supply now of junk. God, it's bigger than the depot ever was. The "puzzle" is—it is stuff they will never use—so why waste hundreds of dollars freight? 'Tis some joke.

— has been relieved as property chief, and —, assistant, is now chief school supply —; knows his job. — (referring to the other man) is a joke, but personal friend of —'s, you know. 'Tis some ring they are all playing. I am. 'Tis funny, though, the way they handle inspectors and visitors.

If Forbes could only see the "lovely" high (8) grass; and if fire comes—boom! up she goes. Tell old "Bob" Forbes there will be hell to pay on his heat problem, even with the employees. All of 'em won't turn in and pay for heat and then build their fires like C. and I. * * * Well, old boss, 'tis a wonderful time—as happy as can be—as soon as we can lift the freight embargo we will be through.

Let me know when Forbes is going to sell by sealed proposals; then's when I get a Rolls-Royce. Got a good drink coming; so here's back to you.

TRIPP.

P. S.—If you want to use certain information in this, quote it to them. Thanks. If you want more, ask.

The record and sworn testimony of W. C. Black shows that the writer of this letter was not discharged. The man Black, who was chief clerk at the time and under whose special supervision Tripp came, whines that the letter was personal to him, and continues to draw $4,500 per annum in the Veterans' Bureau.

That is some of the kind of makeshifts we have down in the Veterans' Bureau. When a man like Black is sitting down there drawing $4,500 a year with authority over other employees, what can we expect in the way of service? Such men as this should not be on the Government pay roll.

What about Commander O'Leary, who has a place in the Navy to-day, and whose honesty was questioned in 1913? He was undoubtedly brought into the Veterans' Bureau under the direction of Forbes, and, I believe, for the special purpose of aiding the disgraceful graft at Perryville. If you will just read these records and see the scoundrels who are now on the Government pay roll and note their conduct during the past year or two, you will not wonder that the people of this country are getting tired of paying taxes to support a set of skunks who steal it as fast as they can pay. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman state from what record he is reading?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I am reading from the printed record of the Veterans' Bureau investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to call the attention of the Members of this House to the deplorable conditions in the National Military Home and its 10 branches from Maine to California. The standard of living and the subsistence in the hospitals has been going down steadily under a Board of Managers which has felt the pressure of economy until our sick are virtually being fed on skimmed milk, spoiled eggs, and wormy cereals, and the Board of Managers comes before Congress, the Budget Commissioner, and the committee asking merely to maintain this revolting standard in the hospitals of the soldiers' homes, and their requests for funds have been met by a cut in this bill of $315,597, which means a further lowering of the already vile conditions. It means cutting down of food and cutting down of the already inadequate hospital care.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman believe it is possible that men are being fed upon spoiled eggs because of the economy in appropriations? Is not that the fault of the man who buys rotten eggs?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope so.

Mr. ANTHONY. I trust the gentleman will not lay the blame on Congress for a condition like that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want it understood that I am not reflecting upon this subcommittee or the Appropriations Committee; that I am not attacking the Board of Managers of the National Military Home, but I am appealing to the conscience of the Members of this House, which is responsible for these conditions.

The Board of Managers was created in a time of political excitement, when the President of the United States did not have the confidence of either the Senate or the House, and that Board of Managers reports and is responsible to no administrative department of our Government. The reports of the Board of Managers are made to the Speaker of the House or to the House, and have not been published for a number of years. The Speaker of this House, in his efforts to promote economy, has prevented my attempts, and the attempts of others, to secure the publication of these reports.

I want you to know what the standard is in the treatment of these fine old veterans of the Civil War, the veterans of the Spanish-American War, and of the World War. On the 11th of December, 1923, despite the fear of making complaints, which are constantly present in the minds of these boys, 152 tubercular patients in the hospital at the Central Branch of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio, signed a petition and sent it to me complaining about the condition of their food.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
Dayton, Ohio, December 11, 1923.

HON. ROY G. FITZGERALD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, patients of the tuberculosis section of the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, do hereby file this letter of complaint of the food conditions here with you and trust that some action will be taken on this matter.

The food is of poor quality and improperly cooked, being served cold most of the time, and at times there is an insufficient quantity.

I shall add this petition with the signatures at the end of my remarks, the report of the official investigation, the comment of the Veterans' Bureau, and then a letter to Congressman COLE showing that things have become worst than before.

I want now to tell you that I laid this complaint before the Inspector General of the War Department, and that I laid it before the Veterans' Bureau, because all of these 152 boys, who had the courage to tell of conditions there, were members of the Army during the late war.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Did the gentleman ever make any complaint to any member of this subcommittee as to the conditions to which he refers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I talked with Mr. ANTHONY about it and talked with Mr. BARBOUR about it, both of whom are here.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Did the gentleman ever appear before our committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I spent parts of two days listening to the testimony and what was going on.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Did the gentleman ever present that petition to the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That petition was presented openly and was referred to several times before, and it has been going on for weeks and months.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I mean was it brought to the attention of Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only to tell about it.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Does it appear in the hearings anywhere?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. I am not finding any fault with this subcommittee, but I am revealing conditions which went on there.

Now, what does the inspection show? I have before me—which I desire to insert in the RECORD—a letter from the Veterans' Bureau, dated February 9, 1924, from which I will read just a word or two:

With further reference to your letter of December 26 to the director, dealing with the complaint of 152 men in the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, concerning subsistence in that institution, you are advised that through Gen. George H. Wood, president Board of Managers National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the complaint has been investigated. A copy of the complete report, which is self-explanatory, is attached for your information.

The Veterans' Bureau is of the opinion that the complaint of the petitioners was justifiable, and is so recognized by Col. B. K. Cash, Inspector General, whose report was transmitted by General Wood.

This whole letter will be inserted in the RECORD along with the complete report at the end of these remarks.

That is the present standard. Do you want me to analyze it? I have here some of the figures as to cost of subsistence. Do you know what it is costing to feed the men in the hospital who are attempting to get well from consumption in that national military home? They are fed at an expense of 55 cents a day. In the common jail at Dayton, Ohio, we allow 70 cents a day for each criminal and prisoner. In the hospitals of the Veterans' Bureau, where they are feeding the same kind of patients in tuberculosis hospitals, it costs 88 cents a day. Do you know what they are feeding these fine old men, these veterans of the Civil War who preserved this Federal Union—those splendid veterans of the war with Spain, every man a volunteer? In the general hospital they are feeding them for 34 cents a day. The Veterans' Bureau pays 64 cents a day. Do you know that they are feeding those not in the hospitals—the attendants—at the cost of 26 cents a day, and can you imagine what kind of attendants these men get, where they are fed at 26 cents a day in the national military home?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I remember that it was distinctly testified before the committee a year ago that in the case of tuberculosis patients in soldiers' homes they were giving them steaks, eggs, rich cream, and other food suitable for patients suffering from that sort of a disease.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would the gentleman like to hear some of the evidence?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am telling the gentleman the testimony before the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had it inspected, and I can tell my good friend from Tennessee that a charitable institution at Dayton, Ohio, has had to go out and help feed men in the tuberculosis hospital because of the scandalous character of their treatment. I have just read to you the complaint of 152 men of the World War, and I have read to you a report stating that their complaint was justified. Now, what do you suppose has happened since then? I will read a letter written to my colleague, Hon. CLINT COLE, by a boy from his district in that same tuberculosis hospital at Dayton who wrote about these conditions, after I had had the complaint of 152 patients investigated and, I hoped, corrected.

That letter is as follows:

WARD 33, N. M. H.,
Dayton, Ohio, February 18, 1924.

Hon. CLINT COLE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During the late war I served six months in the United States Army at Camp Jackson, S. C. Seven weeks of this time I was in the base hospital with pneumonia and aspirated chest, seven days unconscious. Previous to this time I had never been sick a day in my life. Yet the Veterans' Bureau tells me they can not possibly connect my present tuberculosis disability to the service. For this service I received monthly pay of $7.40, plus $60 additional at discharge.

That is all right. I try not to complain on that score. But when we come to this home because we must, certainly we can expect the Government to give proper treatment. No doubt they are paying for it, but we are sure as hell—not getting it. If any tuberculous man or woman can live, let alone get well, on the food they serve, I would like to see him. All eggs are cold storage. Have very bad odor and taste, not to mention looks. No butter or crackers part of the time. Poor milk. Sauerkraut, bologna, corned beef, and the like. Boiled potatoes and beef every meal. Nothing seasoned. The dishes and pitchers are often dirty. The food is usually poorly cooked.

Sometimes excellent meals are served, but very seldom. We patients are complaining about the usual run of meals, especially the breakfasts and suppers. Some time ago complaint was made through petition. For a couple weeks things seemed to improve. They are much worse at present than previously.

Of course, I understand we ex-service men are a bunch of bums, Treasury robbers, etc. There seem to be a few up your way, too. Well, Clint, I am from Findlay where we try to treat everyone square.

Will you, or will you not, lend your support in trying to improve the eats and conditions here?

Very truly yours,

FAY W. FELLER.

That followed the official investigation which proved the truth of the allegations which I had known from an independent source, and I say to you that the home management is not wholly to blame. I hold no brief for Gen. George H. Wood. He is president of the Board of Managers, the only one receiving any salary at all, and that most inadequate. He is well informed, active, loyal, and industrious, but he is acting under the great pressure of economy exerted upon Congress and all departments of the Government, and from men who do not know the conditions and do not understand. Yielding to a constant pressure for economy, the board has pared its estimates to a scale that is niggardly and on which our veterans, whose care should be our sacred trust, can neither be fed nor treated on a decent human standard. And now the standard is proposed to be cut by this bill so that every twelfth day the veteran is to have nothing to eat at all.

The United States Veterans' Bureau hospitals and the hospitals in the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are devoted solely to caring for former service men and women. All are maintained by appropriation of public money.

The hospitals operated by each agency are divided into three groups: First, general; second, tuberculosis; and third, neuropsychiatric. The requirements of food supplies vary considerably in the different groups. The average daily cost of food supplies for the month of January is as follows:

	Veterans' Bureau.	National Home.
General.....	$0.64	$0.34
Tuberculosis.....	.88	.55
Neuropsychiatric.....	.62	.26
Domiciliary members and general employees.....		.26

The estimate of the National Home for subsistence for the Central Branch for 1925 was reduced $29,000. It is estimated that 2,800 members and employees will be subsisted. The reduction amounts to 3 cents per day on each person subsisted.

If the home maintains the same standard for 1925 as obtains now, and furnishes exactly the same food supplies, the cut in the provision would require that there be a fast day for the tuberculosis patients every nineteenth day, for the patients in the general hospital every twelfth day, for the patients in the neuropsychiatric hospital every twelfth day, and for the domiciliary members and general employees who are maintained by the home every ninth day.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Why did not the gentleman present this matter to the subcommittee in written testimony in the way he presents it here this afternoon? Why did the gentleman save a bombshell like this and come in here and let it explode this afternoon?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am delighted to know that the gentleman considers it a bombshell. I spent part of two days before the gentleman's subcommittee and did not see him there at all.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. But there is not a word in the testimony about this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did see the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and my friend from California [Mr. BARBOUR], and I did see Mr. ANTHONY, who is about the most industrious and hard-working Member that I know of in this House, and it ill becomes the gentleman from Iowa to criticize me when he was not there attending to his duty. I was there, and I did see the members of the gentleman's subcommittee, who were attending to their duties.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman tell me why he did not give some testimony so that I could have known of this condition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was ready to give the testimony.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Did the gentleman give it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was not asked to give it, but I told the gentleman's committee that I had this information and was anxious to give testimony.

Gen. George H. Wood was there testifying to the facts and figures. The very able general treasurer of the home was there, Col. C. W. Wadsworth, and I shall in extending my remarks put in the Record a résumé of the testimony of General Wood and the treasurer of the home, which the latter has prepared for me in chart form, showing exactly what they demanded as necessary to maintain even this present loathsome standard with its vile conditions. I want to say that an irresponsible—and I say that advisedly—employee of the Budget Commission took the estimates of the Board of Managers and deliberately and arbitrarily, not ever having been in a national military home, and having concluded that these managers did not know what they were talking about, lopped off almost $600,000 from subsistence, repairs, hospital estimates, and this Subcommittee on Appropriations, I think, went as far as it felt it dared to go, under the pressure of economy in this administration and the impulse and pressure uphold this sacred Budget system, by putting back some hundreds of thousands of dollars onto the estimates.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. The gentleman knows, of course, that the committee raised the Budget estimate for the soldiers' homes something in the neighborhood of $300,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am very glad to have the statement made. The Budget Commission cut the estimates of the Board of Managers $580,900, and the Appropriations Committee, by the bill, restores $265,303, leaving now a deficit of $315,597, which I want this House to make up and more than make up.

Mr. BARBOUR. The committee felt that the Budget officials had themselves been rather strict in handling some of these estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I agree with the gentleman. I am not criticizing this committee. I am now calling the attention of this House to its responsibility. The managers of the soldiers' home report to no administrative department of this Government and no bureau of this Government has supervision over this board. They report to Congress, and you never see their reports, because they are not published, for the reason that we are so economical these days that we can not afford the money necessary to print the reports, and so you are not to be informed about them. Do you know what is the present standard of the hospitals of the 10 soldiers' homes? I want to read to you a letter which I received in response to a letter from me asking that complaints be put in the form of affidavits. The young man could not get any affidavits from the home. Is he responsible? Is this true which I am going to read? Three reputable men of my city—T. C. Lehman, a jeweler; Charles H. Hennessy, a merchant tailor; and Frederick W. Howell—testified to the responsible character of the man who wrote this letter, and General Wood in my office said to me that he knew this splendid though crippled veteran soldier, and that he is entitled to be believed:

DAYTON, OHIO, March 21, 1924.

Hon. ROY FITZGERALD, M. C.,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 8 received. I am sure discouraged. I paid $6 to get some statements and charges written out against the Board of Managers and the governor of the Dayton home. I can't get any of the members of the home to sign them—they are afraid.

I tell you how they did to me. I had to get out of the home. They put old men on both sides of me in Company 7 that could not hold their bowels or water and they would remain in a filthy condition for 8 or 10 days at a time. My stomach wouldn't stand it any longer. They put a man across the table from me with a cancer on his face. I went to the major, Doctor Grover, and had this man put in the cancer ward where he died. This man was a Spanish war man by the name of Benson.

The Regular Army Inspector that comes to inspect the home is aware of the conditions of the home. I think it was in 1917 that I signed charges against the doctors. About the conditions of ward 11 at the home hospital, that ward was torn down in a short time after the Inspector was there from Washington. That same Inspector was at the Dayton home not long ago. All I have to say is that it is a dirty shame the way the old men of the Dayton home are treated.

I come from a family of soldiers. I had two uncles and a grandfather in the War of the Rebellion. My father enlisted in the Civil War as a private soldier and was a colonel at the close of the war after four years and a half service. Eighty-third Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He died in 1897 and I am glad that he didn't have to go to the soldiers' home.

I know it is not the fault of Congress or the Government of the United States, for they are not aware of the conditions that exist at the Dayton home. I was discharged from the Regular Army by reason of disability in 1905 after four years and nine months service. I put over two years in the Philippine Islands. I lost my limbs while in employ of the quartermaster at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind., doing my duty as a citizen of the United States. I had to go from Indiana to Milford, Ohio, to vote in 1908. I was on my way back to work when I was hurt. I have been a cripple for 16 years and put 16½ years in the Dayton home. I am very thankful to Congress and the Senate that I get $30 a month pension and I think I can live out of the home on that.

What you want to do, Mr. FITZGERALD, is to get rid of that Board of Managers. Put the home under the War Department, then it will be a place to live.

With best regards and thanks for what you are trying to do for the soldiers of all wars,

Yours respectfully,

HARRY SCOTT,

125 S. Western Avenue, Dayton, Ohio.

The bill as reported makes radical reductions from estimates submitted by the home.

At the Central Branch the total cut of about $76,000 falls principally on three items—subsistence, hospital, and repairs. The estimates submitted were based on maintaining service on present standard. The reduction would have to be met by sacrificing the standard. This would reduce what heretofore has been considered a low standard. No question but what it would result in general dissatisfaction and bring discontent in the home.

The cut in the hospital of more than $15,000 would have to be met by reducing personnel. The attendants in the hospital now are not more than one attendant to three patients, being only about one-third of the approved schedule as adopted by the hospitalization board.

Similar reductions for the several branches of the home are similar to the reductions in the Central Branch, and the result of the reduction would be exactly the same at the different branches and would bring the same discomfort to the members of the home.

The Southern Branch at Hampton, Va., has been set aside and is caring for the senile and demented members of the Civil and Spanish-American Wars. The care of these members is very exacting, and funds available have not permitted the employment of sufficient number of attendants to properly care for these helpless members. The estimates submitted were on the basis of handling the situation as economically as possible. The bill as reported reduces the amount asked for under hospital. This will require the dropping off of some of the attendants now employed and further increase the discomfort of the helpless members. The amount asked for under subsistence has been reduced. This is especially unfortunate and can not be met without denying to these old men the kind of diet best suited for them, such as milk, eggs, and so forth. The cost of maintaining the hospital at the Southern Branch was less than the cost at any other branch of the home, and less than $1.50 per day per patient. The reduction in the bill will force a reduced cost and a materially reduced service.

It should be borne in mind that at the home hospitals, such as the Mountain Branch and the Marion Branch, practically all of the patients cared for are World War men, and the major portion of them are beneficiaries of the Veterans' Bureau who are entitled either to be cared for in the soldiers' home or Veterans' Bureau hospitals, as they may elect, and that the home hospitals have been expending for subsistence not more than two-thirds of the amount per day as expended by the Veterans' Bureau hospitals.

The bill as reported cuts the limited amount spent by the home, so it will make the disparity greater than it has been in the past. At all the other branches World War men are admitted and cared for.

Up to February a year ago the soldiers' home classified as an old soldiers' home, the Civil War veterans being in the majority. Since that date the number of Civil War veterans has become reduced until to-day only 42 per cent of the whole membership are Civil War veterans.

I now read the petition in full:

PETITION.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,

Dayton, Ohio, December 11, 1923.

Hon. ROY G. FITZGERALD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Copies to Director F. T. Hines, United States Veterans' Bureau; Capt. William Coffin, director district No. 7, United States Veterans' Bureau; Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS, United States Senate; James A. McFarland, national commander Disabled American Veterans.

We, the undersigned patients of the tuberculosis section of the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, do hereby file this letter of complaint of the food conditions here with you and trust that some action will be taken on this matter.

The food is of poor quality and improperly cooked, being served cold most of the time, and at times there is an insufficient quantity, and we, the undersigned, believe that food of this character is a detriment to the treatment of tuberculosis patients and that this condition should be remedied.

We feel that we are not getting the full benefit of the amount of money appropriated for us here.

HON. ROY G. FITZGERALD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of December 26, 1923, with reference to a petition signed by 152 ex-service men in the tuberculosis section of the hospital at the National Military Home in Dayton, Ohio, complaining of the food.

Immediate investigation is being requested, and upon receipt of report of investigation you will be fully informed.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

I now read the letter from the Veterans' Bureau telling me that the complaint was justified and inclosing report of the investigation:

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
Washington, February 9, 1924.

HON. ROY G. FITZGERALD,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: With further reference to your letter of December 26 to the director dealing with the complaint of 152 men in the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, concerning subsistence in that institution, you are advised that through Gen. George H. Wood, president Board of Managers National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the complaint has been investigated. A copy of the complete report, which is self-explanatory, is attached for your information.

The Veterans' Bureau is of the opinion that the complaint of the petitioners was justifiable, and is so recognized by Col. B. K. Cash, inspector general, whose report was transmitted by General Wood.

It is believed that every effort is being made by the National Military Home at Dayton, Ohio, to obviate this condition and to give claimants a more liberal and well-balanced diet, as well as a diet more suitable to the physical condition of your petitioners.

The Veterans' Bureau appreciates your interest in this matter and believes that under the new arrangement which has been made the cause for complaint will be eliminated.

For the director:

E. H. HALL,
Chief Inspection Division.

I now read the letter from the general treasurer of the Soldiers' Home and present the abstract:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
HEADQUARTERS NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
Dayton, Ohio, March 13, 1924.

From: The general treasurer National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

To: Hon. ROY FITZGERALD, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Statement re appropriation.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am inclosing herewith an abstract of the estimates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which sets out in plain figures the Home's estimate, the budget figured, the amount included in the bill, and the amount reduced, believing that you will find this very much more convenient than to try to unravel tangled figures shown up in the different papers. This shows the item that is short under each of the several subheads of appropriation and fixes it so that an amendment to restore can be made under each item when it is considered.

Sincerely yours,

C. W. WADSWORTH.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the committee disposed to allow me any more time?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sorry we have not any more time available.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

[Mr. LOZIER was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, a few days ago I voted for a soldiers' adjusted compensation bill. When this measure was reported by the Ways and Means Committee the Republican members of the Rules Committee brought in a special rule prohibiting amendments and limiting debate to 40 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LOZIER. I prefer not to yield now.

Mr. SNELL. In making such a statement, I think the gentleman should be fair in stating it.

Mr. LOZIER. If I have made a misstatement, I ask the gentleman to correct me.

Mr. SNELL. Neither the Republican members of the Rules Committee nor any other members brought in a rule to consider that bill. Your statement is entirely wrong.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I accept the gentleman's correction. I now recall that it was by a suspension of the rules, which had the same effect, and the motion to suspend the rules came from the Republican side of the House. This was in accordance with the predetermined plans of the Republican leaders to prevent debate and prevent amendment. It was a parliamentary method of applying the "gag" rule, thereby preventing us from amending the bill so as to provide for an optional cash bonus.

If this time—40 minutes—allowed for debate had been divided equally between the 435 Members of the House, each Member would have had five and one-half seconds in which to discuss this bill that carries ultimately an expenditure approximating $2,025,889,696, covering a period of 20 years. It is estimated that this bill affects 4,293,607 ex-service men and the families of 183,805 ex-service men who died between January 1, 1919, and January 1, 1924. Moreover, this bill vitally affects our entire population, approximating 110,000,000 souls, most of whom are taxpayers, by reason of which they have a substantial interest in this legislation. And although billions of dollars of public funds are involved in this legislation, and notwithstanding the fact that 110,000,000 people in the United States, more than 4,000,000 of whom are ex-service men, are materially interested in this measure, the Republican leaders in this House decided to consider this bill under a rule that limited debate to 20 minutes on a side, or 40 minutes, all told; and absolutely prohibited any amendment of any kind or character.

Of course, in the 40 minutes allowed for debate only a few of the 435 Members of the House had an opportunity to express their views. As another evidence of the desire of our Republican friends to suppress debate and avoid publicity, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROS], the evening star of protection and plutocracy, refused unanimous consent to Members to extend their remarks in the Record. This objection deprived more than 200 Republican Members of this House and a like number of Democrats of the privilege of expressing their views on this bill. But, Mr. Chairman, a few self-constituted leaders of the Republican Party in the House can not suppress debate or gag the Members indefinitely. As representatives of sovereign constituencies, the Members of this House have and should exercise the privilege of pointing out the merits or demerits of any pending legislation. To deny this right is tyranny.

Since I became a Member of this body I have not consumed any time in unnecessary debate, nor have I thrust myself forward, but I have endeavored to conduct myself with the modesty and reserve that should and does actuate new Members of this legislative assembly. However, I have not abdicated my rights as the Representative of a great district to express my views on economic problems and matters affecting the public welfare.

Now, while the adjusted compensation was being considered, by the enforcement of the arbitrary rule limiting debate to 40 minutes only about 20 of the 435 Members of the House were permitted to express their views on the pending bonus bill, and, of course, no one was permitted to discuss the measure at length or in detail. I shall to-day exercise my rights as a Member of this House and briefly state the reasons why I voted for the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, and at the same time point out what I consider the defects of the bill.

I am not a new convert to the policy of granting the soldiers of the World War an adjusted compensation. I was nominated and elected on a platform one plank of which called for the immediate enactment of a fair, just, and liberal soldiers' compensation law.

I still favor granting our ex-service men an adjusted compensation that will be fair, liberal, and just. This we must do if we are to keep faith with the men who sacrificed and suffered in the late World War.

We owe a moral duty to the ex-service men to readjust their compensation. They were drawn from the farms, stores, shops, mills, offices, and from every other department of activity. They were not consulted as to their compensation. Their time, their bodies, and their souls were drafted. They were compelled to sever home and business ties. They were suddenly withdrawn from employment and from business activities and thereby lost the opportunity of earning high wages or otherwise participating in the tremendous wealth that came to our people as an incident to the World War. They suffered severe financial losses when they gave up their possessions, parted with their equipment, sold their little belongings, and marched away following "Old Glory."

Those who remained at home shared in the great wealth that came to all classes during the war period. The merchant, banker, broker, tradesman, manufacturer, capitalist, master of finance, and captain of industry prospered immensely and many accumulated fortunes far exceeding the dreams of avarice. Approximately 22,000 new millionaires were created by liberal payments made by the Government for munitions, military equipment, war supplies, and commodities directly or indirectly connected with our military operations, while vast multitudes of our citizens engaged in mercantile, industrial, and commercial pursuits multiplied their wealth over and over many times.

The service men contributed more than their just proportion toward winning the war. They risked everything, including their lives. The Government drafted these boys—conscripted the man power of the Nation. These boys did not in the time of our national peril offer a few paltry dollars to the Government, to be repaid with interest. They tendered their lives, their time, their all, cheerfully, loyally, and uncomplainingly on the altar of their country. This was devotion and sacrifice, compared with which the contribution rendered by those who stayed at home sinks into insignificance.

The Government did not conscript business, industry, and capital. The manufacturing, industrial, and commercial resources of the Nation were not drafted like the man power of our country. The manufacturing barons and industrial lords bargained and haggled with "Uncle Sam" on a "dollar and cent" basis. They permitted their plants to be utilized in the manufacture of munitions, war supplies, and equipment on condition that they be allowed to profiteer at the expense of their country. When the history of this great war is written the most damnable and dastardly page will be the one that records the unblushing, infamous, and shameless profiteering by the manufacturing classes, the powerful interests, and the beneficiaries of special privilege, who preyed on the necessities and distress of their war-swept country. With practically no limit on their profits, these economic vultures plundered the Nation as complacently and unconscionably as Captain Kidd or Jean Lafitte plundered and scuttled ships on the Spanish Main or Seven Seas. [Applause.]

The service men came out of the war poorer than when they entered and without having profited as a result of the war. They had to begin life over again, and as yet this great Nation has done absolutely nothing to equalize the men who won the war with those who remained at home and financially profited by the war.

I ask only fair treatment for the ex-service men. They fought your battles; they defended your Government; they preserved your cherished institutions; they protected your property, and by their service and sacrifice they insured for you and your posterity national tranquility and the continued enjoyment of the blessings of a free people.

Now the ex-service men are not asking for a bonus, as this term is generally understood, but they are asking for a readjustment of their compensation on an equitable basis. They are asking the Government to equalize the insufficient pay of the soldier, taking into consideration the exceedingly low compensation paid the service man and the very serious economic loss he and his family sustained, which is out of all proportion to the contribution made by other classes toward the winning of the World War. Is there anything wrong with this request? I think not.

The Government, during the war, gave something like a half million civilian employees a bonus of $20 per month, and that bonus is still being paid to all civilian employees who receive a salary of less than $2,500 annually. This bonus to employees to date amounts to nearly $300,000,000. The members of the Regular Army and Navy have also received an adjusted compensation amounting approximately to $135,000,000, and as yet the big financial interests have not complained of these allowances or charged that they were unpatriotic, or that they threatened the business stability or economic life of our Nation. The Government has paid the railroads an adjusted compensation amounting to $1,096,000,000 for the use of the railroads during the war, an amount not only liberal but grossly excessive in the opinion of every thoughtful student of the history of the Government's attitude toward the railroads during and following the war period. Moreover, after the war was over, the Government paid the war contractors nearly three-fourths of a billion dollars as adjusted compensation, notwithstanding the fact that these profiteers had already made billions of dollars on their war contracts.

And, mind you, the adjusted compensation paid the civilian employees, the members of the Regular Army and Navy, the railroads, and the war contractors was all paid in cash and not with insurance policies payable at death or in 20 years. No, indeed; all these other adjusted compensations were paid in cash; but when the Government tardily concludes to allow the ex-service men the shadow of adjusted compensation while withholding the substance or real compensation, it says, in effect, "the business and financial conditions of the Nation you protected and saved will not permit us to pay you in cash, so we will make you a present of a nicely engraved policy of insurance, printed in the seven colors of the rainbow, promising to pay you something in 20 years, provided you live that long; and if you die within the 20-year period, we will pay to your heirs or legal representatives the money that you are entitled to now."

The ex-service men have asked us to enact a fair and just compensation bill, with options for cash payment or insurance. This request you have denied. The bill you and I voted for is not the bill the ex-service men want and not the bill that the American people demand. In secret caucus, behind barred doors, the Republican leaders conspired to defeat the just and reasonable plans and appeals of the ex-service men, and ruthlessly proceeded to emasculate the bill indorsed by the ex-service men and sanctioned by the American people of all political faiths. You know that this bill is a makeshift and you did not dare let down the bars and give the Members of this House a chance to amend it, so as to allow the soldier boys what they want and what they are entitled to.

I voted for this bill not because I considered it a fair, just, and final settlement with the ex-service men, but because it was the only bill that I had a chance to vote for. If I had been given an opportunity of voting for a bill that would give the ex-service men the option of accepting insurance or a cash payment, I most certainly would have voted for such a measure.

Any bill that does not give the ex-service men the option of accepting a cash settlement in lieu of insurance is not a fair and just measure and does not discharge our duty and obligation to the men who won the World War and thereby preserved the privileges and blessings of our free institutions for future generations. The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee favored a bill granting the ex-service men the choice of insurance or a cash settlement, and the Democratic Members of this House now favor a bonus bill carrying both those options.

The Republican leaders in the House, secretly conspiring with the present Republican national administration, arrogantly said to the Members of this House and to the ex-service men, "Here is our bonus bill; it is all you are going to get; take this or nothing." The Republican Members of this House knew that this bill was not satisfactory and did not go far enough, but they allowed their leaders to ram this bill down their throats and they swallowed it without a protest. If they had done what they wanted to do as real friends of the ex-service men, they would have said to their Republican leaders, "We will not accept this makeshift, and we insist upon the right to amend it so as to give the ex-service men the option of accepting the cash payment in lieu of the insurance certificate."

I say to the Republican Members of this House, that while you had a majority here, you had no right to refuse us the small privilege of amending this bill so as to provide for a cash payment at the option of the ex-service men in lieu of the insurance provision. My Democratic colleagues challenge the leaders on the Republican side of the House to "take the bridles off" and let the rank and file of the Republican Members vote their real sentiments on this bill. The great majority of the Republican Members, deep down in their hearts, were and are opposed to this bill in its present form, because it does not carry a cash option. If the President, Mr. Mellon, and "big business" had turned them loose and let them vote their sentiments, they would have joined the Democrats in passing a real, honest-to-goodness compensation bill that would provide a cash payment in lieu of the insurance feature. But the Republican leaders "put on the muzzle" and applied the "gag rule," because they knew that this bill does not go far enough and does not give the ex-service men what they want or what they are entitled to. The ex-soldier has asked for bread, and you offer him a stone. Deep down in your hearts you know that this bill is a makeshift and that it falls short of what we should do, if we are to do anything, for the ex-service men. This is the first time in our history when this Nation has settled its obligations with insurance policies. The Members of this House are getting cash for what the Government owes them in the way of salaries, and they are not accepting insurance policies in lieu of cash.

This bill was planned and is now fathered by those who are now opposed and who have always been opposed to any soldier-bonus legislation—men who have schemed, planned, and conspired to defeat the passage of any adjusted-compensation measure of any kind or character. This bill was not drawn by the friends of adjusted compensation but by its enemies. [Applause.]

You are not fooling the ex-service men. They know that you are not giving them what they want and what they are entitled to. Those of us who favor a real adjusted-compensation bill, such as the ex-service men want and deserve, voted for this bill, although we were not satisfied with it, because it is the best we could do for the ex-service men at the present time. In voting for this bill I want the world to know that I did not and do not consider it a just, full, and final settlement of the soldier-bonus question. I will not admit for one moment that we can escape our duty to the men who suffered and sacrificed to perpetuate our institutions by merely granting them the grossly inadequate relief this bill carries.

No question is settled finally until it is settled right, and the passage of this pending measure will not settle the bonus problem. It will come up again in succeeding sessions of Congress, and ultimately this Nation will right the wrong that you are now doing, and ultimately the Congress of the United States will grant to the ex-service men the full justice and consideration that you are denying them to-day.

I contend that we should look this question squarely in the face. We should grapple with this problem and solve it now. It is folly to evade, postpone, or equivocate. The bill that passed the House, if it should become a law, will sooner or later be amended and supplemented by additional legislation, because the bill does not settle the question and does not fairly reflect the sentiment of the American people. No thoughtful student of public events can question the accuracy of these conclusions. Until this bonus question is settled and settled right, it will disturb political and business conditions throughout the Nation. It is unwise to postpone a fair and final settlement of the problem.

The Government can settle the bonus question now for less money and on more favorable terms than at any time in the future. We are interested in compensating the ex-service men and giving them something that will help them; something they can get, use, and enjoy now while they need help. This Congress is not specially interested in providing funds for the use and enjoyment of the heirs and legal representatives of these boys 20 years from now, after these ex-service men have crossed over the "great divide." When these boys lie mute and motionless in death it will not help them if their heirs collect their insurance from the Government. We ought to legislate for these boys, for people now on this earth, and not primarily for the next generation. Why not pass a fair, just, and final adjusted compensation bill that will settle the question for all time, and thereby eliminate it from politics and from the business affairs of the Nation?

I voted for the adjusted compensation bill, although I realized it did not and does not offer adequate and equitable compensation for the ex-service men, but it was the only bill that the Republican majority in this House has given us an opportunity to consider and vote upon, and under the "gag rule" imposed on us we were not permitted to offer amendments to perfect the bill and convert it into a fair and just compensation measure. I was not and am not satisfied with the bill, because it does not go far enough; but as a friend of the ex-service men I accepted it for the time being, well knowing that it will be supplemented by additional legislation in succeeding sessions of Congress.

If this bill becomes a law, some succeeding Congress will enact legislation under which these insurance certificates may be commuted and redeemed by the payment to the ex-service men of the cash value of such certificates at the time of such redemption. Why not do this now? [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to direct the attention of the committee to a bill in which it seems to me every Member of the House should be interested. The purpose of this bill is to provide a modern, practical, safe, economical method for assembling the certificates of presidential electors from the several States. The present method, as you gentlemen are advised, is to have a special messenger bring from each State the certificate of election. The cost of this method is approximately $15,000 each presidential election.

To have these certificates brought by an individual as contrasted with the possibility of having them brought by registered mail is not only ridiculous from the standpoint of unnecessary expense, but it is clearly more hazardous.

Going briefly into the details of the present procedure, the electors of President and Vice President are selected in each State on Tuesday after the first Monday in November. Approximately three months thereafter, to wit, on the second Monday in January, they meet and give their votes.

It is provided in the existing law that the governor of the State shall communicate, under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States a certificate of the selection of the electors as soon as practicable after the determination. When the electors meet, it is the duty of the governor of the State to deliver to them three duplicates original of the certificate of their election. They in turn certify by three duplicates original their determination. They attach one of the certificates issued by the governor to each of the certificates made by themselves. They "appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate at the seat of government one of the certificates." It will be noted that this certificate is left in the custody and protection of this person until the time of its delivery. Another copy of the certificate is forwarded "by the post office to the President of the Senate at the seat of government" and the remaining of the certificates is delivered to the judge of the district in which the electors shall have assembled.

It is provided that—whenever a certificate of votes from any State has not been received at the seat of government on the fourth Monday of the month of January in which their meeting shall have been held, the Secretary of State shall send a special messenger to the district judge in whose custody one certificate of the votes from that State has been lodged, and such judge shall forthwith transmit that list to the seat of government.

It is also provided that if the President of the Senate is not at the seat of government when the person intrusted with the certificate of the votes of the electors arrives, the certificate shall be delivered into the office of the Secretary of State, to be delivered to the President of the Senate.

The messenger is allowed 25 cents per mile for bringing up the certificate to the seat of government.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Rhode Island. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state for the benefit of Members very briefly the alternative method provided for in the gentleman's bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The bill which I have introduced, and shall ask to be incorporated as a part of my remarks, proposes that in lieu of the meeting of the electors in January they shall meet on the second Monday of December, which, it will be observed, is two months after their selection. In lieu of three duplicates original of these certificates this bill provides for the issuance of six duplicates original, one copy to be left with the district judge, as is now provided for by law, another copy to be forwarded by registered mail to the President of the Senate at the seat of government, as is now provided by law, except that "registered mail" is used instead of "post office."

Two copies are to be delivered to the secretary of state of the State, one copy of which is to be kept as a public document in his office, open to public inspection. Two copies are to be sent to the Secretary of State at the seat of government. One copy is to be a public document in his office, the other copy is to be held subject to the order of the President of the Senate. It is provided that when no certificate shall have been received by the President of the Senate or Secretary of State by the fourth Monday in December, the secretary of state of the State shall be directed to send to the President of the Senate the copy of the certificate being held by him subject to the order of the President of the Senate. That when no certificate shall have been received at the seat of government by the fourth Monday of January, a special messenger shall be sent to the district judge of the district to send up the copy in his possession.

There can be no question that this proposed arrangement would add to the security and certainty or proper delivery.

Depositing one copy of this certificate with the secretary of state of the State and another copy with the Secretary of State of the United States as public documents would afford a better method of giving publicity and public access to the information contained therein than the present method of publishing the certificate of the selection of the electors in a newspaper, as is now provided.

The services of a special messenger would probably never be required, but if required, it could be availed of. The expenses of getting these returns to Washington would probably be less than $100, whereas the total cost of the present method is approximately $15,000 each presidential election.

The present absurd, unnecessarily expensive method stands as a constant witness against the capacity of the Congress and against the professions of Members of Congress that they are interested in the economical administration of the Government. In my judgment, it is not only required of the public official that he shall honestly and earnestly be interested in the economical administration of government, but it is his duty to remove every just ground for suspicion that he is not interested in the economical administration of the Government. It does a substantial hurt to the public interest to have the citizenship of the country question the sincerity of the motives of public officials.

Gentlemen, how can you answer the criticism directed generally against a responsible governmental agency when each four years the people are again reminded of the fact that through the failure of congressional action they are compelled to pay, in my State for instance, about $425 out of the hard-earned money taken from the taxpayer of the country in order to get to Washington the presidential election returns, with regard to which the whole country has been advised for months, and which ought to be brought to Washington, all of them, for less than $100? And how can we, in fact, if we are genuinely interested in our people whom we know now are tax burdened, permit longer this unnecessary expense which must be paid by the people of the country?

At a time like this, especially when there are grave questionings in the country as to whether or not the Congress is really in sympathy with the people of the country, burdened with taxation, what answer can you make to the people when some man goes down to the station, as is true with reference to my State, gets on the train to bring the election returns here and the people are compelled to pay $425, by the authority of the Congress, to get to Washington the results of an election which the people have known about all over the country for months, and which could be sent to Washington for 50 cents?

Outside of saving money, which is our duty, and ought to be our ever present earnest purpose always, it is not a good thing for the people to be pointing their finger and saying, "That is all rot. Those people get up there in Congress and talk about being interested in the taxpayers. Don't you remember when so and so went up to Washington to carry the returns, under a law that was applicable to conditions before we had a developed postal system even the conditions of the pony express and the stagecoach." And yet for three years this bill has been pending here. I want some action on it, gentlemen, and I respectfully ask of the Congress, in the name of the country, that when the election returns come to Washington at the next election that no man be able to say that he has a concrete illustration and a demonstration of the fact that these professions on the part of Congressmen that they are interested in economy are false.

The present chairman of this committee has not long been chairman of the committee. This bill has not been reintroduced very long. I want to make that statement because the failure to have action earlier is as much my failure and responsibility as that of the members of this committee.

Mr. WURZBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WURZBACH. How great a saving would be effected by the change?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We pay about $15,000 when we ought to pay about $50 at most.

Mr. WURZBACH. What is the total expense to the Government of the transportation of these people from the different States?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The whole thing, transportation and advertisement, costs about $15,000.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I dislike to take even a moment of the gentleman's time because he is so nice and courteous, but is it not a fact that the whole arrangement is a fiction in our Government and the Electoral College never had any practical use? It never effectuated the purpose that was intended by the framers of the Constitution. They cast the vote of their respective political parties; and, I will ask the gentleman, is not the result sent to Washington in many different ways and long before the official bearer of these returns gets to the Capital of the Nation?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Everybody knows all about it long before the messenger arrives. It will not take long to pass this bill. I am going to ask to incorporate in my remarks a copy of it. I wish you gentlemen would examine it and I hope that it will be gotten through and change this expense and ridiculous method of getting up to Washington the election returns each four years.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I believe the bill came to the Committee on Elections from the gentleman now addressing the House, an amended bill; is that right?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; I have recently reintroduced it.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. And the gentleman will insert the amended bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Well, I want publicly here and in this manner to assure the gentleman from Texas that the bill will have very prompt consideration—

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. And although it might seem that the Committee on Elections did not have much business before it, it is a hard-working committee and has a great mass of legislation referred to it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I take all the responsibility upon myself for the bill up to the present time, and if the gentleman will take it from now on I will be very much obliged and be in a good humor.

I know the House is anxious to adjourn. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Room by inserting the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8054) providing for the meeting of electors of President and Vice President, for the issuance and transmission of the certificates of their selection and of the result of their determination, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the electors of President and Vice President of each State shall meet and give their votes on the second Monday, in December next following their appointment at such place in each State as the legislature of such State shall direct.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the executive of each State, as soon as practicable after the conclusion of the appointment of electors in such State, by the final ascertainment, under and in pursuance of the laws of such State providing for such ascertainment, to communicate by registered mail under the seal of the State to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such ascertainment of the electors appointed, setting forth the names of such electors and the canvass or other ascertainment under the laws of such State of the number of votes given or cast for each person for whose appointment any and all votes have been given or cast; and it shall also thereupon be the duty of the executive of each State to deliver to the electors of such State, on or before the day on which they are required by section 1 of this act to meet, six duplicates original of the same certificate under the seal of the State; and such certificate shall be inclosed and transmitted by the electors at the same time and in the same manner as is provided by law for transmitting by such electors to the seat of government the lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice President; and if there shall have been any final determination in a State in the manner provided for by law of a controversy or contest concerning the appointment of all or any of the electors of such State, it shall be the duty of the executive of such State, as soon as practicable after such determination, to communicate under the seal of the State, to the Secretary of State of the United States, a certificate of such determination, in form and manner as the same shall have been made; and the certificate so received by the Secretary of State shall be preserved by him for six months and shall be a part of the public records of his office and shall be open to public inspection; and the Secretary of State of the United States at the first meeting of Congress thereafter shall transmit to the two Houses of Congress copies in full of each and every such certificate so received at the State Department.

Sec. 3. That the electors shall make and sign six certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

Sec. 4. That the electors shall dispose of the certificates so made by them in the following manner:

First. They shall forthwith forward by registered mail one of such certificates to the President of the Senate at the seat of government.

Second. Two of such certificates shall be delivered to the secretary of state of the State, one of which certificates shall be held subject to the order of the President of the Senate or of the Secretary of State, the other copy to be preserved by him for six months, and shall be a part of the public records of his office and shall be open to public inspection.

Third. On the day thereafter they shall forward by registered mail two of such certificates to the Secretary of State at the seat of government, one copy of which certificate shall be held subject to the order of the President of the Senate; the other copy shall be preserved by the Secretary of State for six months and shall be a part of the public records of his office and shall be open to public inspection.

Fourth. They shall forthwith cause the other of the certificates to be delivered to the judge of the district in which the electors shall have assembled.

Sec. 5. That when no certificate of votes mentioned in this act from any State shall have been received by the President of the Senate or by the Secretary of State by the fourth Monday in December of the year in which the meeting shall have been held, the President of the Senate, or if he be absent from the seat of government, the Secretary of State, shall request by the most expeditious method available the secretary of state of the State to send up the certificate lodged with him by the electors of such State, and it shall be his duty upon receipt of such request immediately to transmit such certificate by registered mail to the President of the Senate at the seat of government.

Sec. 6. That when no certificate of votes from any State shall have been received at the seat of government on the fourth Monday of the month of January, after the meeting of the electors shall have been held, the President of the Senate, or if he be absent from the seat of government, the Secretary of State, shall send a special messenger to the district judge in whose custody one certificate of the votes from that State has been lodged, and such judge shall forthwith transmit that list by the hand of such messenger to the seat of government.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. I yield a half minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman. I ask the Clerk during my time to read this telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

BAKERSFIELD, CALIF., March 20, 1925.

HENRY E. BARBOUR,

Washington, D. C.

Please convey to Members of House of Representatives the congratulations and appreciation of the hosts of the Kern County Council of the American Legion for the splendid expression of fair play and justice to the service men of the World War exemplified by overwhelming passage of adjusted compensation bill.

R. L. CURRAN,

Commander Kern County Council.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCHAFER. At this time I intend to confine my discussion to the part of this appropriation bill appearing on page 97, lines 20 to 24, inclusive, namely, the appropriations for the Northwestern Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. I have spent considerable time at the national home in my district, in which reside veterans of all wars, and have had personal contact with most of its residents, both domicillary and hospital patients. A new tuberculosis annex has recently been added, in which there are at present about 300 World War veterans in all stages of tuberculosis.

During the summer a petition was circularized by the tuberculosis-annex patients, in which they complained bitterly about conditions, especially regarding the food. This petition, containing about 200 signatures, was sent to General Hines, Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, as these patients were Veterans' Bureau patients. After a careful study of the committee hearings on the appropriation for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and considering other evidence which was brought to me, and after consulting with the officers of the Disabled Veterans of the World War of this hospital, I do not hesitate to say that the patients had ample grounds to complain.

I believe it to be the wish of the great majority of the citizens of the Republic that the disabled soldiers be taken care of, be they veterans of the Civil, Spanish-American, World, or other wars. Even the bitterest enemies of the adjusted compensation bill use the phrase, "Everything for the disabled."

I will at the proper time offer amendments to that part of the appropriation bill which relates to the Northwestern Branch, which is in my district, and trust my colleagues, in whose districts the other national homes are located, will offer similar amendments to the appropriations for the homes in their districts. The amendments which I will offer will be as follows:

On page 97, line 21, after the word "expenses," strike out the figures "$57,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$100,000."

In line 21, after the word "subsistence," strike out the figures "$287,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$600,000."

At the beginning of line 22 strike out the figures "$139,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$200,000."

In line 22, after the word "hospital," strike out the figures "$230,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$400,000."

In line 23, after the word "repairs," strike out the figures "$47,050" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$80,000."

In line 23, after the word "farm," strike out the figures "$13,790" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$33,790."

In line 24, after the word "branch," strike out the figures "$774,840" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,414,290."

I believe that this amount is absolutely necessary to take care of the disabled veterans at the Northwestern Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on September 5, 1923, submitted to the Budget officer a statement estimating the amount necessary for support of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925. This letter appears on pages 1357 to 1363, inclusive, of the committee hearings, which reads in part as follows:

Supplemental statement accompanying estimate of appropriation, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, fiscal year 1925.

There is inclosed herewith estimate for appropriation for the support of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, fiscal year 1925. In compliance with letter of the Director, Bureau of the Budget, dated August 14, 1923, limiting the total amount of estimates to not exceed $7,500,000, the various items have been reduced to amounts below what will be required to keep the service up to the standard that has heretofore been maintained.

Each and every item has been carefully considered, and to maintain a proper standard of service based upon the continuation of rates of pay as now authorized it is believed that the estimates should be submitted for the various items, as follows.

The estimate for the Northwestern Branch at Milwaukee, Wis., is as follows:

Northwestern Branch:
Current expenses.....	$74,000
This amount will provide for maintaining the present service at rates of pay now authorized.
Subsistence.....	300,000
This is estimated to provide food supplies and service for the subsistence of about 1,000 hospital patients and hospital employees and 900 domiciliary members and general employees, on a basis of less than 60 cents per day for the tuberculous patients, 40 cents per day for the general patients, and 33 cents per day for the domiciliary members and general employees.
Household.....	150,000
This amount will be required to provide fuel, gas, water, electricity, laundry supplies and service, and for the purchase of such household supplies as may be required, estimated on present prices.
Hospital.....	300,000
This provides for the personnel, equipment, and supplies for operating the general hospital of 309 beds and tuberculosis hospital of 800 beds.
Transportation.....	5000

Repairs.....$65,000
This amount is believed to be necessary for maintaining the service and keeping buildings, machinery, etc., in proper repair.

Farm.....18,000
This amount is believed to be necessary for maintaining proper service, keeping cemetery, roadways, grounds, parks, etc., in proper condition.

In all, Northwestern Branch.....907,500

The total estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, for this home, submitted by the president of the Board of Managers, amounts to $907,500 for the Northwestern Branch at Milwaukee. The appropriation provided by the present bill for this branch is only $774,840. The total amount for the Northwestern Branch which would be provided if my amendment is adopted would be $1,414,290. I submit my amendment after careful consideration and a thorough digest of the reports of the hearings and other information which I have accumulated as well as personal observations at this institution and personal contact with the ex-service men who reside or are hospitalized therein.

The present pay of the employees at this home is inadequate to provide for efficient service.

On March 15 I wrote the following letter to General Wood, president of the Board of Managers:

MARCH 15, 1924.

Gen. GEORGE H. WOOD,

National Home, Dayton, Ohio.

DEAR GENERAL WOOD: Referring to the matter of expenditures in the National Home, would you kindly give me the number of employees at the National Home, Wisconsin, and the salaries paid each class, and the number of employees in each class. I note, for instance, that surgeons are paid $342. Under what heading in the Budget are included the salaries of the staff and employees? I note on page 1370 of the hearings that the Budget estimate for upkeep of the grounds and the three and one-half miles of road amounted to $13,790, for the Northwestern Branch. Can you give me the amount the government at the home requested? I know that the grounds are in a deplorable condition, and that they need attention. I question whether $13,790 is sufficient to satisfactorily repair the roads and improve the grounds.

Cordially yours,

JOHN C. SCHAFER.

And received the following reply:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

HEADQUARTERS, NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,

Dayton, Ohio, March 19, 1924.

From: The president, Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

To: Hon. JOHN C. SCHAFER, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Subject: Expenditures in the National Home.

MR. DEAR MR. SCHAFER: Upon my return from Washington I find your letter of March 15. I am going to endeavor to answer it as fully as possible, but it is rather difficult to give some of the classifications and sum totals asked for. To start with, answering your question, "Under what heading in the Budget are included the salaries of the staff and employees?" would say that the salaries of the staff and employees are paid under every heading of the Budget except transportation, being classified under the head of Budget according to their duties at the branch.

There are at the present time at the Northwestern Branch 222 member employees, 845 civilian employees, and about 20 officers of the branch, the largest proportion of whom are assistant surgeons in the two hospitals. Naturally there is a very wide scope in the pay, running from $350 per month, paid the governor, down to $24 for janitors, orderlies, etc. As the employees are scattered through seven heads of appropriation it is impossible to accurately group them under classes, but I would say that at least 75 per cent of the employees receive less than $75 per month.

The governor of the Northwestern Branch requested a special appropriation of $25,000 for improvement and building up of roads. This was not submitted as a special item, as it would not be consistent with the law governing, but the total appropriation under "Farm" asked for was $14,440, which was cut to $13,790.

I have endeavored in the above letter to answer the specific questions contained therein, and if there is any further information which you want, please do not hesitate to call on this office for same.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE H. WOOD,

President Board of Managers,

National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The estimate for subsistence made for the Northwestern Branch by General Wood is $300,000, which is made on the basis of less than 60 cents per day for the tuberculosis patients, 40 cents per day for the general hospital patients, and 33 cents for the domiciliary members and general employees. This meager estimate is, of course, inadequate.

I insert in the Record a table showing the cost of rations January, 1924, for the nine branches of the N. H. D. V. S. and the cost of rations at the Northwestern Branch shown by this table is 27 cents per day for domiciliary men, 35 cents per day for general hospital patients, and 52 cents per day for tubercular patients.

Cost of rations, January, 1924.

Branch.	General.	Hospital.	T. B.	Noncombination.	Combination.
Central.....	$0.25	$0.28	$0.47 .37 .63		$0.27 $0.26
Northwestern.....	.27	.35	.52	$0.25	.34
Eastern.....	.30	.35	.27
Southern.....	.26	.36			.25
Western.....	.22	.30		.21	.24
Pacific.....	.21	.43	.58	.20	.27
Marion.....	.52	.36	.50	.23	.32
Danville.....	.24	.29		.25	.27
Mountain.....	.30		.57 .61 .57 .52	.36
Sanitarium.....		.30	.66

It is impossible to feed these men sufficient nutritious food at these prices. This is a great deal less than the usual allowance at prisons and poorhouses. Who in the name of goodness can provide proper food, cream, fresh eggs, and so forth, for a tubercular patient on an expenditure of 60 cents per day.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BEGG. Is there any reason that the gentleman knows of—I think there is much in what the gentleman says—but is there any reason why the managers of any hospital for tuberculosis patients would deny first-class, clean, wholesome food to a patient even though the appropriation was not big enough; could he not feed them and ask for a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. SCHAFER. The president of the Board of Managers stated in substance at the committee hearing that after the Budget Committee had cut down his estimates, which were on the basis of 60 cents per day for subsistence for tubercular patients, if the appropriation was based on the Budget recommendation it necessarily would reduce the subsistence allowance in his estimate which was based on 60 cents per day per capita for tubercular patients, and they would not expend more and come to Congress for a deficiency appropriation.

One of the gentlemen asked the question of Mr. FITZGERALD whether or not the man who purchased the eggs was not responsible for the stale eggs. Where, in the name of goodness, can you find fresh eggs and good cream and good food for these patients at the rate of 60 cents a day?

In the Veterans' Bureau hospitals the ration cost per day for general hospital patients is 64 cents and for tubercular patients is 88 cents. It is remarkable that the national homes can obtain rations for the same class of patients at a price so much lower than the Veterans' Bureau hospitals. The Veterans' Bureau ration cost is so much higher than the national home ration cost that it is plainly evident that the national home veterans are not properly fed.

Let me ask you Members of Congress how far 27 cents, 35 cents, or 52 cents per capita per day would go for food in your own homes? Many of the men who are fed on these prices are in the last stages of pulmonary tuberculosis. Are we to believe that this Government of ours will only spend these paltry sums for rations for the disabled veterans?

This new tubercular hospital at the national home in Wisconsin was erected in a vacant plot of the national home grounds. The grounds around the hospital have never been landscaped. The roads in the home grounds are in a deplorable condition. The proper landscaping of the grounds and the repair of the roads will be of material benefit and comfort to the residents of the home. The roads are in such a poor condition that on my many visits to the home I was reluctant to drive my Ford into the grounds. The $20,000 added by my amendment to the appropriation under the heading of "Farm" is for the purpose of landscaping around the new tuberculosis hospital and properly repairing the roads in the home grounds.

I believe in all fairness to the men who have served this Nation in times of war that a special congressional investigating committee should be provided to thoroughly investigate all conditions in the national homes and report back to the next session of Congress.

There are many men in the tuberculosis hospital and the home hospital who are slipping by inches into their graves; many of them who were in the flower of youth when they went into service; and many of them had long duration of service and were in the thick of the fight for months, and because of their service have contracted a disease which is frequently incurable and which is sapping their energy and life.

It is an oft-heard complaint from department heads that they can not remedy conditions because of insufficient appropriations by Congress. I am submitting these amendments to Congress so that the disabled will know by our action whether or not the fault lies with Congress or with the department heads. It is a false economy to cut appropriations for the soldiers' homes for the purpose of reducing the expenditures of the Government. The total appropriation for all the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers provided in this appropriation bill, H. R. 7877, amounts to $6,527,504, as shown on page 100, line 7. It is not unreasonable to increase this appropriation properly to provide for those men who offered their lives for the country.

On page 93 of this appropriation bill I note an appropriation of $7,000,000 to be made available for the work on Dam No. 2, on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals. If this House of Representatives can appropriate $7,000,000 as a further gift to Mr. Ford, it is not unreasonable to ask that they appropriate an additional amount sufficient properly to take care of the Nation's disabled soldiers.

The House of Representatives very recently appropriated approximately $14,000,000 for the Coast Guard for the purpose of providing that service with the means to combat the so-called rum running, and it certainly can not in justice fail to appropriate sufficient money to take care of the disabled soldiers.

I sincerely hope that proper consideration will be given to the appropriation for the National Homes for the Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, so that all former soldiers in all of the homes can be decently cared for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he would be willing to concede the general debate at this time, so that the committee might rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would be very glad if we could use 10 minutes of it now.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman in charge of the bill think we ought to close general debate this evening?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not believe that we ought to close general debate this evening, when one of the members of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], has not had an opportunity to speak. He really does not desire to speak until Monday morning. He has not had opportunity yet.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It will not be possible for this committee to go ahead on this bill on Monday morning, and possibly it might be late in the afternoon before the consideration of it could be resumed. A number of reports from the Committee on Rules will be considered on Monday morning, so that in all probability the consideration of this bill will not be resumed until Tuesday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Well, the fact that this bill can be put aside for consideration of other bills shows in itself that there is no particular hurry about the disposition of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman knows that it is very rare that any appropriation bill is considered on a Monday. I only express the hope that the general debate could be concluded this evening, so that we can go ahead on this bill as soon as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Ohio ought to remember that some of us have been here all day without anything to eat, while he himself has been out of the Chamber.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I admit that I have had something to eat. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think we ought to give a little more time to the bill to-day, and give a little time the next day; not much, but some.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was simply hoping that we could finish general debate this evening.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I understood that as a member of the subcommittee I should have an hour's time, like some other members of the committee. I do not care whether that comes up under the general debate or under the five-minute rule. If I could get unanimous consent to speak under the five-minute rule for an hour, I shall be glad. Perhaps I might not use all of the time. I ask for it now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I find also that one of the members of the committee on this side of the House has not spoken yet and desires to speak. I am sure we do not desire to prevent both of the gentlemen having an opportunity to present their views to the House. How would this suggestion do: That the general debate on the bill shall close in one hour; the committee will rise shortly; and one additional hour of general debate hereafter, and then proceed with the reading of the bill for amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To-day?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not to-day; but that one additional hour of general debate shall be had, and the time shall be equally divided.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How can the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] be allowed time under that arrangement?

Mr. ANTHONY. We will deal liberally with the gentleman from Virginia. Our understanding is that he would prefer not to use the time to-day, but under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I will take it either way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He will take it either way he can get it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not tell what the House will do under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the agreement as to time has to be made in the House instead of in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can make its own arrangements about the time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Not about closing debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; not about closing debate, but as to time.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I think we will save time by moving to rise.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7877) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some agreement with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] with regard to the ending of the general debate on the War Department appropriation bill. I will ask if he will agree that general debate shall continue for one hour more, and then we will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think it has been understood all along that one of the minority members of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], shall have an hour, and if the general debate is to continue only an additional hour and be divided between the two sides, I think it would be impossible for him to get the hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. He said he would prefer to use his time under the five-minute rule. Of course, we could not make an agreement to cover that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We can make an agreement in the House that would be binding on the Committee of the Whole. We are in the House now, and I would be very glad to see an arrangement made by which the gentleman from Virginia can have an hour, and if the other member of the subcommittee wishes an hour I do not see why he should not have it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then let us make the agreement that we will close general debate in an hour and a half, the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But that will not give the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] his hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. We will give the gentleman from Virginia his hour if he wants it.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I believe my good friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] will be liberal. I have a matter in this bill in which I am vitally interested, and I may want to use, perhaps, 10 minutes under the five-minute rule. I have not taken up any time in general debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. As far as I am concerned I will be very glad to have the gentleman use that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, so that there can be no misunderstanding about it—and as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] himself does not understand it quite clearly—I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is to have an hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. If he wishes it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to know what the situation is.

Mr. ANTHONY. The understanding is that general debate on the bill now under consideration shall close within an hour and a half when the bill is next taken up, after which time we shall proceed with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that general debate close at the end of an hour and a half when the bill is next taken up. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2686. An act to authorize the Federal Power Commission to amend permit No. 1, project No. 1, issued to the Dixie Power Co.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1530. An act providing for the marking with an enduring monument the site of Charles Fort, S. C.; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same.

S. 2446. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Clarks Ferry Bridge Co., and its successors, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near the railroad station of Clarks Ferry, Pa.; and

S. 2420. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of South Dakota for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Potter County and Dewey County, S. Dak.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 24, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 24, 1924.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we thank Thee for this morning. Surely winter is past and the time of the singing of birds has come. We pray that in our own hearts there may be a springtime of gladness, of larger hope, and a desire to be more and more identified with the things which last. Speak unto us this morning, we beseech of Thee, and enable us to enter upon the duties of the day with the consciousness of Thy presence, and with an increased willingness to walk in the paths of Thy commandments. Hear and help us. Guide us, we beseech of Thee, along life's pathway until duties end. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1924.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. GEORGE H. MOSES, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MOSES thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

THE JOURNAL.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The principal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Edwards	King	Shields
Ashurst	Elkins	Ladd	Shipstead
Ball	Ferris	Lodge	Shortridge
Bayard	Fess	McKellar	Simmons
Borah	Fletcher	McKinley	Smith
Brandegee	Frazier	McLean	Smoot
Brookhart	Geary	McNary	Spencer
Broussard	Gerry	Mayfield	Stanfield
Bruce	Glass	Moses	Stephens
Burnham	Gooding	Neely	Swanson
Cameron	Hale	Norris	Wadsworth
Capper	Harrell	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Harris	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Copeland	Harrison	Pepper	Warren
Couzens	Heflin	Pittman	Watson
Curtis	Howell	Ralston	Weller
Dale	Johnson, Minn.	Ransdell	Wills
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Reed, Pa.
Dill	Kendrick	Robinson
Edge	Keyes	Sheppard

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to state that the Senator from Washington (Mr. JONES) is necessarily detained from the Chamber on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there appeared this morning in the Washington Post—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, what is the order of business, may I ask?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presentation of petitions and memorials. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized under that order.

Mr. HARRISON. There appeared an article headed The Republican Crisis. It is an editorial from the Washington Post, Ned McLean's paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator presenting a petition or memorial?

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that it be read for the delectation of Republican Senators.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it a petition or memorial?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a remonstrance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York demand the regular order?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. HARRISON. It is a memorial I desire to have read to the Senate, an editorial in the form of a petition addressed to the Republican Party—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I inquire of the Chair as to whether in his judgment this is a petition under the meaning of the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not of that opinion. The Chair is of the opinion that the regular order having been demanded, the Senator from Mississippi is not in order. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. If my friends on the other side will stay with me I shall read it a little later.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state the inquiry.

Mr. KING. I submit that the editorial which the Senator from Mississippi is about to read, if not a petition, is a memorial. It presents certain features respecting the Republican Party and memorializes the leaders of that party to do something to save the party from wreck and disaster.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is still of the opinion, as highly as he regards the leaders of the Republican Party, that they are not the Senate of the United States and can not be memorialized under this head of business.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Chair a question? Are they not Members of the Senate any longer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the Chair's opinion that if they ask recognition the Chair will recognize them.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought perhaps the Chair was ruling that they were no longer Members of the Senate and could not be memorialized for that reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah desire to appeal from the ruling of the Chair that the Senator from Mississippi is not in order?

Mr. KING. I think the ruling of the Chair is erroneous, but I shall not appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1924.

Resolutions favoring the passage by Congress of legislation increasing the compensation of postal employees.

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States legislation increasing the compensation of postal employees from the present unreasonably low rates to amounts that will more nearly accord with the increased cost of living and the efficiency and loyalty which have always characterized the service rendered by said employees, an act of simple justice that has been too long deferred: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts respectfully urges upon Congress the speedy enactment of legislation that will enable such employees to maintain their families in accordance with American standards of living and will provide for them compensation comporting with the importance and dignity of the Postal Service; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In house of representatives, adopted, March 6, 1924.

In senate, adopted in concurrence, March 10, 1924.

A true copy. Attest:

F. W. COOK,

Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE also presented resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1924.

Resolutions requesting the Congress of the United States to appropriate funds to carry out certain recommendations of the Chief of Staff of the United States Army made in furtherance of the national defense act of 1920.

Whereas the President of the United States in a recent message to the Congress of the United States has stated that the Army and Navy of the United States should be strengthened and that a people who neglect their national defense are putting in jeopardy their national honor; and

Whereas, in furtherance of the national defense act of 1920 and in order to increase and promote the strength and effectiveness of the Army, the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States has recommended substantially as follows:

(a) That the Regular Army be brought back to the strength of 150,000 enlisted men and 13,000 officers, and that it be suitably housed and enabled to conduct annual maneuvers on a moderate scale.

(b) That the National Guard be given the support necessary to permit its progressive development toward a strength of 250,000.

(c) That the skeleton organization of the Organized Reserves be adequately maintained.

(d) That all reserve officers receive an average of 15 days' training in each three years.

(e) That the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units be further developed.

(f) That provisions may be made for a gradual increase in the number accommodated annually in the citizens' military training camps: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts respectfully and earnestly urges upon the Congress the necessity of appropriating such funds and enacting such legislation as will adequately provide for the effective carrying out of the provisions of the national defense act of 1920, and also the recommendations of the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States hereinbefore set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth, and to the members of the congressional Committees on Appropriations and on Military Affairs.

In house of representatives, adopted, March 5, 1924.

In senate, adopted in concurrence, March 10, 1924.

A true copy. Attest:

F. W. COOK,

Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented petitions of sundry citizens in the State of New York, praying an amendment to the Constitution granting equal rights to women, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of House bill 7111, authorizing the Department of State to accredit to the embassies and legations of the United States agricultural attachés, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Powell, Park County, Wyo., praying for the passage of legislation repealing the excise tax on motor vehicles and accessories, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEPPER presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 2012, creating an agricultural export commission, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted by Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion, in the nature of a petition, which I ask may be inserted in the Record and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. These are the most comprehensive set of resolutions which I have ever read coming from the American Legion or any other association in our country on the subject. They present an example which ought to be emulated by the whole world. I compliment and congratulate this post. I am proud of it.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF CLEMSON COLLEGE POST, NO. 42, AMERICAN LEGION.

[Adopted November 7, 1923. Clemson College, S. C.]

For a long time the members of Clemson College Post, No. 42, American Legion, have felt that if the world is to have peace and if the last war is to be a war to end war, then some steps other than and different from those already taken must be now advanced. The resolutions printed below are the product of much thought and were adopted only after careful consideration. It is the sense of this post and others who have made a study of these resolutions that they offer the only real rock-bottom solution of the greatest problem now before the world. Disarmament, limitations, conferences, etc., must follow and not precede the course suggested in the following:

"Resolutions of Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion.

"Whereas in the recent World War we fought against the antiquated system of national rivalries which foment war, and thought that at the end of that struggle some means would be devised for settling international disputes by process of law based upon justice among nations; and

"Whereas that thing seems not to have come to pass in spite of the efforts made to that end, but instead the old system of suspicious, war, and national rivalries in trade and armament is continuing, although the very existence of civilization and of whole peoples depends on displacing this system with a better, and this after five years of reconstruction; and

"Whereas the American Legion has gone on record on numerous occasions as favoring a judicial procedure in settling all international disputes; and

"Whereas Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion, having considered the foregoing facts carefully and realizing that the accomplishment of the thing for which we fought and which made our sacrifices seem worth while is still in the indefinite and uncertain future, has come to the conclusion that the only way to make the realization of our object sure is to further in every way possible the education of all peoples to the fact that war is unnecessary, illogical, and can be dispensed with: Therefore be it

Resolved by Clemson College Post, No. 12, of the American Legion, That we do all in our power at all times to further this end and that we urge all peace-loving people throughout the world to do likewise; be it further

Resolved, That we consider the only safe basis for permanent peace to be that spirit of brotherly love and mutual understanding among nations which will insure a full measure of justice to all nations; be it further

Resolved, That we suggest the following concrete activities as being among those suitable for this purpose:

"1. Believing that the existence of permanent peace depends upon the proper education of the coming generations along these lines, that we urge writers and teachers of history and allied subjects to guard against anything which might create an unfriendly spirit in the minds of their readers and pupils toward any other country than their own; and

"2. That we urge the International Sunday School lesson committee to set aside at least one Sunday per year for the consideration of world peace and human brotherhood, and request ministers of the gospel to devote one or more sermons per year to this theme; and

"3. That this post establish an annual prize or series of prizes for the best essays produced on this topic by any pupil in the local schools, and that we urge all Legion posts and post auxiliaries and all interested organizations in all counties to do likewise; that we urge our State Legion to give a similar series of prizes open to entries throughout the State; that we urge the national Legion to make some phase of this topic the subject for the annual essay contest; that we urge the national and State Legions to work out a series of prizes for college students, to include, if practicable, prizes given in each college so as to draw out as large a number of entries as possible; and that the widest publicity be given these things.

"4. That we subscribe for the American Legion Weekly for each room in the local schools seating pupils of the sixth grade and above, and urge all other posts to do likewise.

"5. That we urge the American Legion to attempt to associate itself with the other World War veterans' associations (including those of former enemy countries) and all other societies which will cooperate in the adoption of an international slogan to the general effect that war is not inevitable, that it can be prevented without the sacrifice of the national honor of any country, and that the time is ripe for such prevention; such slogan to be selected as the result of a world-wide contest, and that it appear upon the first cover page of every issue of the American Legion Weekly and of as many cooperating journals as possible.

"6. That we urge the national Legion to require each post in its annual report to make reply to the question: 'What have you done during the past year to further the cause of world-wide peace?'

"7. That we urge all posts and other public-spirited organizations to adopt these or similar resolutions with a suitable plan of action and to present this topic on suitable occasions; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be filed with the papers and other records of this post, that a copy be sent to the national and all State headquarters, to the American Legion Weekly with a request that it be published in every Legion post in South Carolina, to our representatives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the South Carolina State Legislature and the Congress of the United States, to the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of South Carolina, to the President of the United States and his Cabinet, and to such other individuals and organizations as this post may from time to time direct.

"THE PLAN OF ACTION.

"In furtherance of the provisions of the foregoing resolutions this post on the same date as the adoption of the resolutions also adopted a plan of action putting the provisions into specific form. This plan of action, on the execution of which the post is now engaged, is briefly this:

"1. Offering of three prizes in the local high school for the best essays on the subject: 'How can permanent peace be achieved?'

"2. Subscription for the American Legion Weekly for each room in the local school seating pupils of the sixth grade and above.

"3. Getting in touch with the other posts in adjacent counties with the idea of getting county prizes offered similar to those above.

"4. Getting in touch with department headquarters with the idea of getting similar prizes offered in other schools and in the colleges.

"5. Having these resolutions and plan of action printed for distribution.

"8. Reading the resolutions and plan of action at our annual Armistice Day banquet, November 12, 1923."

We request all Legion posts and other interested organizations or individuals to give this their careful study. We suggest that the matter be brought up at one meeting and be acted upon at a later one. If you feel as we do about these things we urge you to adopt these or similar resolutions with a suitable plan of action, and do all you can to further the peace idea.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by Memphis (Tenn.) Post, No. 1, of the American Legion, in reference to soldiers' pardons. I ask unanimous consent that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

THE SOLDIERS' PARDON RESOLUTION.

[Passed by Memphis Post, No. 1, American Legion.]

Whereas this post of the American Legion stands staunchly and steadfastly for the objects declared in the preamble of our constitution, and that among these are:

"To foster and perpetuate a 100 per cent Americanism * * * to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation * * * to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy."

Whereas this post at all times endeavors to practice as well as profess those declared principles, and is determined to transmit to succeeding generations these basic and cardinal principles untarnished and undiminished, and to repel every assault upon them, open or insidious, so that they shall not become high sounding but empty phrases; and

Whereas the existence of the Nation, its culture, ideals, civilization, material and moral welfare demand that future generations be imbued with the ideal of patriotism and performance of duty to one's country regardless of all personal considerations, and any act of our Government which gives to the coward or traitor greater consideration than that given to the loyal citizen establishes a precedent which induces and encourages treason and cowardice is destructive of patriotism, and is in defiance of our declared purposes and previous personal sacrifices; and

Whereas the United States of America, subsequent to the declaration of war, has knowingly or unknowingly committed acts which give every appearance of encouraging disloyalty and treason in that—

"Our Government has not prosecuted and has not punished the draft dodger, slacker, coward—all willing to abandon this country in a crisis—while its loyal citizens were subjecting themselves to rigid military discipline, strict military law, undergoing personal sacrifice, loss, and danger—many being killed and wounded in its defense;

"Our Government has not punished, and made to disgorge, the profiteer and others of his stripe who were willing to and did hold up and loot this country in its national crisis, and wring blood money out of our patriotic citizens while the loyal civilians and soldiers were foregoing personal gain and making sacrifices;

"Our Government has permitted waste and mismanagement in the agencies designed to alleviate our disabled and wounded comrades, which agencies were provided only after compulsion from the American Legion and loyal civilians;

"Our Government has pardoned the I. W. W.'s, the spreader of sedition, the advocate of resistance to necessary military measures in time of war, the enemy spy; in fact, all who were willing to overthrow the Government and wreck the Nation;

"Our Government continues to hold imprisoned the men who were willing to uphold and defend the Nation, and who in its defense temporarily departed from the path of rectitude, which departure could in no event be a crime against the person or property of more than a few individuals, whereas the unpunished offense of the slacker and profiteer, the pardoned crime of the seditionist and spy were crimes against 110,000,000 people—the entire Nation—showing deliberation and a fixed, settled, mental attitude of treason and disloyalty, which palliated and pardoned offenses were infinitely greater than those of the unpardoned soldiers"; and

Whereas the aforementioned favoritism and neglect have occurred subsequent to the trial and convictions of soldiers, which court-martial proceedings we do not impugn, criticize, or question, as the latter conduct of our Government renders the questions of guilt or innocence, severity of sentences, and such matters wholly immaterial: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by this post of the American Legion, That it condemns the acts and policy of our Government heretofore specified as destructive of our national existence, subversive of patriotic principles, and unmindful and unappreciative of the sacrifices of loyal soldiers and loyal citizens; as an inducement to, and encouragement of, cowardice and disloyalty—rewarding treason and penalizing patriotism; be it further

Resolved, That as it is too late to even the scales of justice and too late to prevent cowardice and treason from being rewarded with pardons we can and will even the scales of mercy, and will not in any event permit the traitor and coward to receive greater consideration than that accorded the loyal; be it further

Resolved, That as no other course is open we urge and demand the release of all soldiers under sentences for offenses committed during the period of hostilities to the end that succeeding generations shall not be convinced that it is safer to abandon or betray the United States of America than to defend it; be it further

Resolved, That the term "soldiers" as used in this resolution shall include any man serving in land, water, or air forces of the United States during the war; be it further

Resolved, That we forward copies of this resolution to our State posts, department officers, national headquarters, and other patriotic and civic organizations, and request their aid and cooperation; be it further

Resolved, That we pledge our delegates to support the soldiers' pardon resolution in the State and national conventions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present two resolutions of the General Court of Massachusetts, which I ask may be appropriately referred and printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions presented by the Senator from Massachusetts will be received, and unless they are duplicates of those presented by the Senator's colleague, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] they will be, under the rule, printed in the Record.

The resolutions were referred to the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads and on Appropriations, respectively.

(See identical resolutions previously presented to-day by Mr. LODGE on page 4776.)

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Kiwanis Club, of Emporia, Kans., favoring the passage of legislation creating a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition, numerous signed, of sundry citizens of Havensville, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation placing more drastic restrictions upon immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of the Kiwanis Club, of Alliance, Ohio, favoring more adequate appropriations for the national defense, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution of the Toledo Clearing House, of Toledo, Ohio, favoring the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the petition of Dr. O. L. Sims and 33 other citizens of Pleasantville, Ohio, praying for the passage of restrictive immigration legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions of Lodge No. 279 of Ramsey, of Lodge No. 315 of Canton, of Lodge No. 33 of Blaine, of Lodge No. 48 of Barberton, of Lodge No. 237 of Conneaut, and of Lodge No. 13 of Bridgeport, S. N. P. J. (being fraternal bodies of Jugoslavs), all in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, and especially against the proposal to register, photograph, and fingerprint immigrants, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FESS presented resolutions of the Ohio Engineering Society, opposing plans to withdraw Federal aid in highway construction, and favoring the prompt passage of legislation providing for a three-year Federal aid program beginning on July 1, 1925, in the amount of $100,000,000 for each of the three succeeding years, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Medina and Fairfield Counties, Ohio, praying for the passage of legislation further restricting immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by citizens of Norwood, Ohio, in mass meeting assembled, favoring the passage of legislation granting adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Piqua, Ohio, praying for a reduction of taxes and for a more simple, efficient, and economical government, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Minerva Club of Kenton, Ohio, favoring the restriction of production of narcotics to the medical and scientific needs of the world, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution of the Toledo (Ohio) Clearing House Association, favoring the granting of increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the memorial of the board of education, Fulton County public schools, of Wauseon, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of legislation creating a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota presented resolutions of Slovanski Budar Lodge, No. 182, S. N. P. J., of Gilbert; of Lodge No. 215, S. N. P. J., of Virginia; of McKinley Lodge, No. 175, S. N. P. J., of McKinley; of Vseslovani Lodge, No. 161, S. N. P. J., of Kitzville; of Freja Lodge, No. 16, I. O. G. T., of Minneapolis; and of Gopher Local, No. 205, of Minneapolis, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill and especially against the proposal to register, photograph, and fingerprint immigrants, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of M. J. Christenson and 46 other citizens of Worthington, Minn., praying for the passage of legislation restricting immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of Edward Hughes and 53 other citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of E. J. Hinn and 43 other citizens of Ella; of F. W. Rosenberg and 44 other citizens, of Louis Speltz and 17 other citizens, of E. T. Connelly and 50 other citizens of Green Isle Township; of A. Wagstrom and 21 other citizens of Fraser Township; of Richard Day and 18 other citizens of Tara Township; of O. Enge and 31 other citizens of Big Woods Township; of Ben Borsen and 20 other citizens of Eldsvold Township; of Ole J. Winjun and 24 other citizens of Deer Township; of James Dever and 35 other citizens of Rollingstone Township; of A. L. Dolney and 15 other citizens of Palania Township; of B. B. Nornes and 18 other citizens of Scandia Township; of Lane Hill, jr., and 39 other citizens of Waconia Township; of J. M. Southwick and 31 other citizens of Medo Township; of A. J. Boldighelmer and 46 other citizens of Pine Lake Township; of G. J. Nordhagen and 17 other citizens of Norden Township; of P. P. Kukowski and 34 other citizens of Barta Township; of W. J. T. Kersen and 18 other citizens of Gregory Township; of William Karol and 29 other citizens of Caribou Township; of L. A. Campbell and 18 other citizens of Saratoga Township; of Elmer Edlund and 32 other citizens of Alfsborg Township; of F. R. Marrs and 20 other citizens of Battle Township; of A. N. Anderson and 20 other citizens of Jo Davis Township; of E. B. Stroutruberg and 14 other citizens of Timothy Township; of Orton Gullickson and 9 other citizens of Garfield Township; of C. A. Steen and 28 other citizens of Canton Township; of F. C. Wirt and 35 other citizens of Drammen Township; of Peter Sorensen and 8 other citizens of Surfwater Township; of A. D. Miller and 22 other citizens of Hammond Township; of Fred Prahl and 47 other citizens of Mulligan Township; of Knut M. Anderson and 14 other citizens of Nereson Township; of H. H. Steerdage and 25 other citizens of Fair Haven Township; of Oscar S. Anderson and 21 other citizens of Foster Township; of John J. Strom and 11 other citizens of Solem Township; of J. A. Swenson and 17 other citizens of Fish Lake Township; of Alfred Nelson and 41 other citizens of Silver Creek Township; of Arthur Nelson and 16 other citizens of Nordland Township; of Sam Ramiller and 61 other citizens of Sinnott Township; of R. J. Olson and 32 other citizens of Hoff Township; of J. A. Oslund and 32 other citizens of Brunswick Township; of H. F. Nerge and 37 other citizens of Freeland Township; of C. W. Quick and 15 other citizens of Fanny Township; of H. S. Dahlin and 22 other citizens of Thief River Falls; and of G. H. Smith and 51 other citizens of Browns Valley Township, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the so-called McNary-Haugen bill, providing aid to agriculture, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

MARIA HELENA AMERICA VESPUCCI

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to make a request for unanimous consent of the Senate to permit the withdrawal from the records of the Senate under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Senate of a certain petition. The petition was presented to Congress by one Maria Helena America Vespucci on January 29, 1839. The petition, with no other connected papers, is now on file with the Secretary of the Senate. Madame Vespucci was connected with the early history of the city of Ogdensburg. At that city there has been established an institution which is known as the Remington Memorial, which occupies the house in which Madame Vespucci lived for more than 18 years. If consent of the Senate be granted to my request, it is the understanding that the petition will be sent to that memorial and made a part of its records.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator state what is the request that he is submitting? It was impossible to hear the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York requests unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the office of the Secretary of the Senate of a certain petition which was filed in 1839 by a Madame Vespucci. The Chair would ask the Senator from New York if any adverse action has been taken upon the petition?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If any adverse action has been taken upon the petition itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not informed as to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual form for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the Senate is "there having been no adverse action thereon."

Mr. CURTIS. Under the rule a paper may not be properly withdrawn from the files of the Secretary of the Senate unless there shall have been no adverse action thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is, the order of withdrawal must be so worded?

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest to the Senator from New York to let the matter go over until he ascertains the exact state of facts in reference to the petition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that an arrangement may be effected to leave copies of the petition on file.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from New York is withdrawn.

CORRUPT PRACTICES IN BRITISH PARLIAMENTARY AND AMERICAN CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, Mr. Stuart Lewis has prepared a very exhaustive and, I believe, accurate and reliable treatise on the subject of "corrupt practices in British parliamentary and American congressional elections." I present that treatise for reference to the Committee on Printing with the suggestion and request that the committee report and recommend that it be printed as a public document for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The manuscript, with the request accompanying it, will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4439) to amend section 71 of the Judicial Code as amended, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 80) for the relief of the Long Island Railroad Co., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 300) thereon.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2625) to detach Jim Hogg County from the Corpus Christi division of the southern judicial district of the State of Texas, and attach the same to the Laredo division of the southern judicial district of said State. I call the attention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the bill reported by the Senator from North Carolina is one relating to a local change in the southern judicial district of Texas. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Jim Hogg County of the Corpus Christi division of the southern district of the State of Texas be, and the same is hereby, detached from the said Corpus Christi division and attached to and made a part of the Laredo division of the southern district of said State.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President—

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Mississippi will permit the bill to be passed.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understand that no objection was raised to the immediate consideration of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None was raised, and it is before the Senate.

POLITICAL LEADERSHIP.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there is now quite a full attendance of Senators on the other side of the aisle, and I think they should listen while the Secretary reads the editorial from the Washington Post which I send to the desk. Then, of course, under the rules of the Senate any Senator may respond and answer the editorial. It would seem to some of us on this side of the Chamber that the editorial calls for an answer from some of the Republican leaders over there. So I ask that the Secretary read the editorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read from the Washington Post, of Monday, March 24, 1924, as follows:

THE REPUBLICAN CRISIS.

Members of the Republican Party throughout the United States are dazed and shamed by the lack of leadership in their great organization. They can not understand why the Republican Party is subjected to the most humiliating and damaging charges without arousing the resentment of a single leader in Congress. The leaders are not only defied, but insulted, and they take their punishment as if they deserved it. The administration is vilified and the entire Republican organization brought into contempt and worse than contempt. It is even charged with protecting criminals and with being itself a participant in crime. The Government is terribly injured by the wholesale accusations heaped against the party in power. Paralysis has overtaken Congress. There is widespread defiance of the law. The people are beginning to suffer because the party to which they confided the Government is unable to function.

What is the matter with the Republican leaders? Can it be true that they are trembling for fear that further revelations will confirm the truth of what now seems to be infamous calumnies? Or are they craven weaklings who are afraid to stand up for truth and right, because of a selfish desire to keep their own individual names out of the current scandals? One or the other supposition seems to be the truth.

Scoundrels or moral cowards—it is a hard alternative, and the people shrink from imposing judgment. But the people will not wait forever. Republicans by the millions, whose pride in their party is a part of their life, are not disposed to tolerate the cowardice of their leaders in Congress when abominable allegations are made attacking the integrity of their party.

There is beginning to be widespread belief that there is corruption back of the silence which the leaders fear to face.

Where are the great men of the Republican Party? Where are the Hannas, Quays, Platts, Spooners, Aldriches, Chancellors, Hales, Allison, Doolivers, Reeds, Cannons, Paynes, Dalzells, Grosvenors, Moodys, Manns, Tawnays, and scores of other champions of Republicanism who regarded an assault upon the honor of their party as a personal insult, and who never failed to carry the war into the enemy's camp? Is the Republican Party dead? Is it so lacking in leaders that it is about to disintegrate and disappear?

The rank and file of the Republican Party are true and loyal Americans. They will follow great leaders. But they will not follow men who do not have the courage to defend the party against unjust assault. The time has come when leadership in the Republican Party must be asserted at once by the men who have been elected as leaders, or these men will be repudiated and the party itself will run the risk of destruction.

A presidential campaign is approaching. Through the lack of stalwart and vigilant leadership the Republican Party goes into the campaign as if it were a criminal on the way to execution. Senators who should have defended the Republican Party against villainous insinuations are now silent and apologetic, afraid to confess that they are Republicans. Not one of them has done his duty by his party, and all of them know they are recreant to their party trust.

It is not the Republican Party that is on trial. It is the leaders who are on trial, but if this venality is established the party crashes to ruin. Let them make good while there is time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped that some one else on the other side would ask me a question, but I think some Senator on that side should ask me a question.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is not the Mr. McLean of whom we have been hearing in the investigations the editor of the newspaper from which the editorial has just been read?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and I think he is owner of the newspaper also.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does not that editorial sound like he is perilously near going over to the Democratic Party? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I think he is thoroughly disgusted with the Republican leadership, as the whole country is.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is not that very much to the credit of the Republican leadership?

Mr. HARRISON. I think he should have exercised the same good common sense long ago and joined the Democratic Party, and he would not have gotten into all the mess in which he now finds himself.

Mr. BROOKHART. Right now I will say to the Senator that the Democratic Party may have him so far as I am concerned. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question if he will permit me. If he is going to give Ned McLean to the Democratic Party, will he also separate the Republican Party from Henry Ford, whom it recently acquired?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I will say that you can have him, too.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2625) to detach Jim Hogg County from the Corpus Christi division of the southern judicial district of the State of Texas, and attach the same to the Laredo division of the southern judicial district of said State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATIONS BY THE SENATE.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read at the desk a letter which I have recently received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the letter is in the nature of a memorial or a petition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has asked unanimous consent for the reading of the letter, and consent has been granted.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that letter the beginning of the defense of the Republican side of the Senate? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not recognize that as a parliamentary inquiry, and therefore does not feel called upon to answer.

The reading clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, which is entire, as follows:

ROCKFORD ILL., March 21, 1914.

Senator W. B. McKinley,

Washington, D. C.

MR. DEAR SENATOR: John Smith says that he heard a man with red whiskers talking to a stranger on the street and saying that Bob White's wife said that her mother had told her that a man who looks like some of the pictures of some of the United States Senators was on a Chicago & North Western Railway train a year ago, and she heard him bet a box of cigars with another man who looked like a bootlegger that the stock of the New York Central Railroad Co. would advance 2 points within 60 days, and that it was "a good buy" and he was going to purchase a couple of shares.

There is considerable excitement here about it, and because of the very clear, relevant, competent, and convincing evidence being produced before the senatorial committees now, the publication of which is convincing the people generally of the wonderful statesmanship and patriotism of the membership of said committees, the people—three or four—want this outrage investigated.

There are those who think the three or four above referred to are the only ones in this State who still retain respect for and confidence in our form of government and our Congress, but they are probably feeling depressed because spring is late.

Really, Senator, I hope that I am not—but fear that I am—right in thinking that our Senate to-day is doing more to bring upon Congress and our whole Government the contempt, the suspicion, and the fear of good citizens than anything which has happened in our lives. I think it tragic.

Am glad that the Senators from Illinois are not a part of it; and please pardon the liberty I take in writing this. The writing keeps me from swearing.

Very respectfully,

STANTON A. HARR.

Mr. HEPLIN. Mr. President, I suggest that this able defense of the Republican side should be printed in the Record immediately following the editorial just read from the Washington Post.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 2912) granting a pension to Sarah Elizabeth Robinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKHART:

A bill (S. 2913) for the establishment of migratory-bird refuges to furnish in perpetuity homes for migratory birds, the establishment of public shooting grounds to preserve the American system of free shooting, the provision of funds for establishing such areas, and the furnishing of adequate protection for migratory birds, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2914) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River approximately midway between the city of Owensboro, Ky., and Rockport, Ind.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FESS:

A bill (S. 2915) to amend and supplement an act entitled "An act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce," approved August 20, 1916; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2916) for the relief of William Jones; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 105) authorizing the President to detail an officer of the Corps of Engineers as Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PEPPER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 106) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of an equestrian statue of General San Martin, which the people of Argentina have presented to the United States; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. SMITH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) declaring agriculture to be the basic industry of the country, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calendar be considered, and that only unobjected bills be taken up.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the calendar, and that only unobjected bills shall be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether it is his intention to begin at the beginning of the calendar?

Mr. CURTIS. It has been several weeks since the calendar was called from the first, and I think we ought to begin at the beginning.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I do not wish to object, but I do feel that we ought to decide whether or not we are to pass H. R. 655, which is the bill providing for reciprocity with Maryland. This is the last week we shall have in which to consider that proposition. I shall be out of the city after Wednesday. If we are to have reciprocity, it will be necessary to take up the bill to-day.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, under the rule it would require unanimous consent to take it up now. I suggest that the Senator wait until after 2 o'clock, and see if he can not get up his bill then. Personally, I am in favor of the measure; I think it ought to be passed; but if it is taken up now it means that the morning hour will be exhausted on this bill alone. We have not had the calendar under consideration for several days, and under the rules this day is set aside for that purpose.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, the only reason why I make this request is that a month ago the Governor of Maryland wrote asking as to whether in my judgment it would be worth his while to extend the reciprocity for one month. I asked him to extend it, and told him I was sure that by the 1st of April we would know whether or not Congress was willing to grant reciprocity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BALL. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did the Committee on the District of Columbia report in favor of exempting all the automobiles in Washington from property taxation?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, when the bill is up before the Senate for consideration those matters will be taken up. I think it is necessary, first, to decide whether or not we are going to consider it.

Mr. McKELLAR. When the Senator is asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, it seems to me it is fair to ask the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request before the Senate is the one preferred by the Senator from Kansas to proceed with the consideration of the calendar at its beginning, and that none but unobjected bills shall be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. BALL. I shall not object, Mr. President, with the understanding that—

Mr. CURTIS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas whether his motion contemplates taking up the measures on the calendar from the beginning?

Mr. CURTIS. It does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

REPRESENTATION BEFORE SENATE INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The first business on the calendar was the resolution (S. Res. 118) providing that any person or agency investigated by any Senate committee shall have the right to be present in person and by attorneys and to present evidence in their own behalf.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, that resolution has been under discussion heretofore, and I am satisfied that it can not pass and that it should not pass. I therefore move that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who introduced the resolution, is not here. I suggest that the Senator ask that it be transferred to the calendar under Rule IX.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Arkansas that Senate Resolution 118 be transferred from the calendar under Rule VIII to the calendar under Rule IX.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1330) for the relief of the estate of Ely N. Sonnenstrahl, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1918) relative to officers in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before I consent to the consideration of that bill I should like to know its purpose. As I understand, it is merely to increase the compensation of some officer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. Warren] is familiar with the provisions of this bill, and in discussing it with him two or three days ago he indicated to me that he would like to offer an amendment by which the bill would be confined merely to the renaming of the office now held by the incumbent, so I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1867) for the relief of the estate of John Stewart, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. In the absence of explanation I shall object.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Harreld], who reported the bill, is here.

Mr. HARRELD. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator make a statement about the bill?

Mr. HARRELD. I think the report had better be read, or a part of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The report is quite long.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HARRELD. I am not prepared to make a statement about it from recollection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The bill will be passed over.

FRANK VUMBACA.

The bill (S. 243) for the relief of Frank Vumbaca was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Vumbaca, of Portland, Me., the sum of $419 to reimburse him for damages to his house, No. 409 Washington Avenue, Portland, Me., caused by concussion from blasts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATE CANNIFF.

The bill (S. 334) for the relief of Kate Canniff was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the death of her husband, James Canniff, who received injuries April 15, 1901, while in the service of the United States on the lighthouse tender Haze, and as a result of which he died on October 20, 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DE KIMPKE CONSTRUCTION CO.

The bill (S. 970) for the relief of the De Kimpke Construction Co., of West Hoboken, N. J., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the De Kimpke Construction Co., of West Hoboken, N. J., the sum of $5,655.69 in full settlement of damages suffered by reason of the withdrawal by the Navy Department in November, 1918, of the award of contract to said company for the construction of an oxidation absorption building at the naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this appears to be a bill of considerable importance. I think the author of the bill, or the Senator who reported it, should make an explanation of it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this bill is for the relief of the De Kimpke Construction Co., who were awarded a contract with the Navy Department some time in October, 1918. Without notice to them in the early part of November the contract was rescinded by the Navy Department, although the De Kimpke Co. at that time had incurred certain expenses and had sublet a part of the contract. It being a Navy Department bill, the De Kimpke Co. could not take advantage of the so-called Dent act and come in and obtain redress under that act by suing in the courts, so that the company had to come before Congress and ask for an award.

The facts in the case are that the De Kimpke Co. sublet a part of this contract, with the result that they were sued by the subcontractor. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the De Kimpke Co., and the amount asked for here is for the expenses incurred by the De Kimpke Co. in defending that suit and for other expenses in laying out their plans under the terms of the contract.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, why should the Government pay the expenses of the contractor in defending a lawsuit?

Mr. BAYARD. Because the De Kimpke Co. in perfectly good faith made this contract with the Government; it sublet a part of the contract, and the subcontractor sued the De Kimpke Co., and the De Kimpke Co. won the suit. May I say to the Senate that this bill passed the Senate favorably last winter.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Navy Department, I see, makes no opposition respecting it.

Mr. BAYARD. Absolutely none.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH B. EDDY.

The bill (S. 85) to carry into effect the finding of the Court of Claims in the claim of Elizabeth B. Eddy was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Elizabeth B. Eddy, widow of Charles G. Eddy, of New York, N. Y., the sum of $602.92, and the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like some explanation of this bill. This seems to be a claim going back to the year 1863. It is hoary with age. I hope that it has merit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this bill has been reported favorably in three Congresses. It is to pay for service which this man rendered during the war as a military telegraph operator, and for which he was not paid. The Court of Claims has examined the figures in the case and the date upon which he joined the military telegraph service. Having been a private in Company A of the Twenty-fourth Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry from July 23, 1862, he was thereafter detailed to the Military Telegraph Corps and served with them, and later on was furloughed and reduced to the rank of private. The report of the committee itself and the findings of the Court of Claims make it perfectly clear that at the time the man was finally discharged from the service he had coming to him the sum of $602 and some cents. The auditor for the War Department, or the appropriate authority, when the claim was presented to him, stated that he had no authority under the statute to pay it. It is true that the claim has been pending for many, many years, but that does not detract from the merit of the claim. The money was owing to the man.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry? My understanding is that this man was an enlisted soldier, and that because of his ability as a telegrapher he was detailed to discharge the duties of telegraph operator in connection with the military operations of the Government. If that be true, it would seem to me that he ought not to receive more compensation than was paid to other soldiers in the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, perhaps the easiest way is to read a portion of the report. I read from the report, as follows:

Charles G. Eddy enlisted as a private in Company A, Twenty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry, July 23, 1862.

On December 23, 1862, he was detailed as a telegraph operator by order of Gen. A. D. McCook for duty at his headquarters; that he served on said detail until June 14, 1863, when he was directed by Special Field Orders, No. 192, from headquarters of General Rosecrans, to report to Capt. J. C. Van Buzer for service in the United States Military Telegraph Corps.

That on February 26, 1864, he was furloughed by Special Order No. 93 of the War Department to enable him to enter the service of the United States Military Telegraph Corps, and that from and after February 26, 1864, he was carried on the rolls at civilian's pay at $100 per month.

That during the period from December 23, 1862, to February 26, 1864, he performed the duties of a telegraph operator and was only paid the pay of a private at $13 per month, and that there is due the claimant the difference between the pay of a private at $13 per month and $100 per month, the compensation paid to telegraph operators during said period, amounting to $1,230.80.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator from New York, who is a fair man, if he can see any justice in a situation of this kind—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I can.

Mr. KING. A man enlists, or is drafted into the Army as a private, and after serving some time it is discovered that he has, for instance, ability as a cook, or ability as a chauffeur, or ability as a telegrapher, and he is detailed, during his period of enlistment, to serve as a cook, or chauffeur, or telegrapher. Does the Senator think he ought then to be lifted out of the enlistment class and given the same compensation that civilians would obtain for like services?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the trouble is that this man was by special order assigned to this corps, and performed the duties of the position alongside of men paid at the rate at which he should have been paid.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that during the war a good many soldiers were detailed for work in the departments here, and they were doing work of the same character as that performed by some civilians. Does not the Senator think that if we pass this bill we will establish a precedent under which thousands of soldiers who were doing work similar to that civilians were doing in the Army might make claim for compensation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the days of the Civil War there was no branch of the Army doing this kind of work in the strictly military sense. The Military Telegraph Corps was organized during the Civil War. It was manned by civilians in the first instance, and later given a certain military status. During the last war the Signal Corps of the Army did all the telegraph work, and the statutes provide what the men of the Signal Corps shall receive in pay, in accordance with their grades, just as is provided in regard to men in the Infantry, the Cavalry, and the Field Artillery.

In the Civil War the situation was entirely different, and the men who were in the Military Telegraph Corps were paid at the rate of $100 per month. This man was in the corps, having been assigned to that duty by special order.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator, if he can answer, whether this man is not now obtaining a pension of $50 a month or more?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The man is dead.

Mr. KING. Is his widow drawing a pension; or are his dependents drawing pensions upon the theory that he was in the military service and would be entitled to a pension if living?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not aware as to whether or not Mrs. Eddy, the widow, is drawing a pension. I assume she is, as the widow of a veteran.

Mr. KING. Then, if she is drawing a pension as the widow of a veteran, she certainly should not receive compensation for civilian work which Mr. Eddy did, drawing compensation as the widow of a veteran, and then refusing to have him labeled a veteran for the purpose of obtaining compensation aside from that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No claim is made in Mr. Eddy's behalf that he was not a veteran—nothing of the sort. He was a soldier all through. If the Senator insists that a man shall not be paid for services at the rate paid other men who worked right alongside of him, very well.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. DIAL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In just a moment I shall yield, and I shall not indulge in any further discussion of the matter. Three Committees on Claims and three Congresses have passed upon this claim. The pay could not have been given to the man, under the statute, after he was discharged from the Army.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from New York to the statement in the report, under the head of "Finding of facts":

On December 22, 1862, he was detailed as telegraph operator at the headquarters of Gen. A. D. McCook, and served under said detail from December 23, 1862, until June 14, 1863.

It seems that he had severed his connection as a telegraph operator, then, on June 14, 1863. Then they found—

It does not appear that said Charles G. Eddy received any pay for services as a telegraph operator for any time prior to January 1, 1864.

The final finding of fact is:

VIII. The claim herein was duly presented to the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, but by them disallowed April 30, 1896, on the ground that they found nothing due the claimant's decedent under existing law.

That seems to have been a finding by the Auditor of the Treasury Department and, as far as I can see, the finding does not quite justify this appropriation.

Mr. DIAL. The Senator from Florida just read paragraph 8 on page 4 of the report, which I had in my hand and intended to read. If Congress is to go back into these old claims, we shall never get through with them. They should not be passed upon here favorably. It adds no dignity to the claim, to my mind, and no authority to say that it passed the last Congress, because many things passed which should not have been passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, we want a vote. We are going to beat some of these claims. The taxpayers are watching us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE CLAIM.

The bill (S. 35) making an appropriation to pay the State of Massachusetts for expenses incurred and paid, at the request of the President, in protecting the harbors and fortifying the coast during the Civil War, in accordance with the findings of the Court of Claims and Senate Report No. 764, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

The bill (S. 1181) naming the seat of government of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the meaning of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I want to find out. If there is no one to explain it, I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1718) to amend section 4404 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act approved July 2, 1918, placing the supervising inspectors of the Steamboat Inspection Service under the classified civil service was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill to amend sections 5, 6, and 7 of the act of Congress making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved July 1, 1902, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. My understanding of this bill is that it relates to the revenue laws of the District, the method of assessment, and so forth. It is a very long bill. I am not quite clear as to its provisions. Doubtless we ought to pass this bill, but it seems to me we will not have time this morning, and in the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], who is the sponsor of the bill, I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

VETERANS' BUREAU HOSPITAL, CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX.

The bill (S. 2100) authorizing the sale of the United States Veterans' Bureau hospital at Corpus Christi, Tex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, no report accompanies the bill, and I think there should be a report showing the reasons for the passage of the legislation. I move that it be recommended to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with instructions to submit a report. The bill certainly should be accompanied by a report.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that he ask that it go over, because the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], who introduced the bill, is not in the Chamber. Will not the Senator just ask that it go over until the calendar is taken up the next time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas withdraws his motion, objects to the bill, and it will go over.

EDWARD N. McCARTY.

The bill (S. 225) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Edward N. McCarty was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission shall be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to extend to Edward N. McCarty, a former employee in the post office in Mattoon, Ill., the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, compensation hereunder to commence from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to know what the bill involves.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, this bill has been before the House and Senate in different years. It passed the Senate last year. The Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Roper, in 1915, recommended that the claim be paid. I know the individual, and I know that it is an extremely worthy case.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not understand what the injury was. I see by the report that the man is totally blind as the result of an accident. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend the benefits of the United States employees' compensation act of September 7, 1916, to Edward N. McCarty."

JOHN H. McATEE.

The bill (S. 107) for the relief of John H. McAtee was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, John H. McAtee, late of Company K, Sixth Regiment Missouri State Militia Volunteer Cavalry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said organization on the 25th day of April, A. D. 1864: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. DIAL. I would like to hear some explanation of the bill. From reading the report it occurs to me that it is a pretty ancient proposition. They have been waiting a long time to get this man back on the roll, since 1864, I believe. I rather think this kind of a measure ought to be relegated to the past. I would like to hear what the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], who introduced the bill, has to say about it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, the facts of this case are these, as the Senator will see if he will look at the report: John H. McAtee joined the Army in Missouri when he was 14 years of age. He served nine months, was captured, was paroled, and was sent home. At that time he was only 15 years of age, but he had rendered nine months of very valuable service in the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was he a regularly enlisted man?

Mr. HARRELD. He was enlisted in the Missouri Militia, which was called into service in the regular way. Other members of that same militia have been recognized as Federal soldiers.

This man produced proof to show that his captain told him that as soon as he could get an exchange for him he would let him know, when he could return and be mustered out. Instead of that, a mistake was made, and he was marked as a deserter, and now he wants to get the record corrected to show that he was not a deserter. The proof is absolutely conclusive that the boy, only 15 years of age, acted in good faith in every step he took in the matter, and I think he is entitled to the relief he asks. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] was the subcommittee to whom the bill was referred. He made a favorable report upon the bill, and I would like to hear what he has to say about it.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. SHEPPARD addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARRELD. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to inquire why almost 60 years were allowed to elapse before application was made?

Mr. HARRELD. He has been trying to get this relief for many years. It came before the Fifty-eighth Congress and several other Congresses since that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. If he was a deserter, I can not see the justice in passing the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. He was not a deserter. This young man was not in any sense a deserter. He was captured and was regularly paroled and never received any orders to return to service during the remainder of the war. He never received an order to return to his command. Therefore it is an injustice to carry him on the rolls as a deserter.

Mr. McKELLAR. How late in the war did he enlist, and how late was it when he left?

Mr. HARRELD. The record shows that he served nine months.

Mr. SHEPPARD. He was enrolled January 9, 1862, mustered into service January 13, 1862, and was present with his company until October 4, 1863, and then he was captured and paroled and sent back to his home.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION AND WIDENING OF STREETS.

The bill (S. 114) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for the necessary extensions and additional buildings to be erected at the Walter Reed General Hospital, in the District of Columbia, all public streets, except Fourteenth Street, and alleys included within the area bounded by Sixteenth Street on the west, Alaska Avenue on the northwest, Fern Street on the north, Georgia Avenue on the east, and Aspen Street, as platted on the official survey map, on the south, be, and the same hereby are, vacated, abandoned, and closed, the portions of public streets within said area which are hereby abandoned and closed by this act being known as Thirteenth Street, Fifteenth Street, Dahlia Street, Dogwood Street, and Elder Street.

SEC. 2. That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to the southern boundary of the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, all in accordance with the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extensions or widening, plus the cost and expenses of the proceedings hereunder, four-tenths shall be assessed against the property which the jury shall find to be benefited.

SEC. 3. That when Fourteenth Street shall be opened for traffic to the south boundary of the property known as the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, numbered for purposes of assessment and taxation as parcel 89 sub 7, the control and jurisdiction of that part of Fourteenth Street as laid down on the plan of the permanent system of highways of the District of Columbia which lies within the said hospital grounds shall immediately pass to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the same in all respects as other streets and avenues in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the grade of the street through the hospital grounds shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, is hereby authorized, payable out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; the amounts collected as benefits to be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to offer two amendments to the bill. On page 2, at the bottom of the page, in line 25, I move to strike out the words "Blair Road" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Butternut Street."

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the meaning of the amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. I was about to explain it. If this amendment is adopted I shall offer another amendment, on page 3, line 2, after the word "Columbia," to insert:

And Piney Branch Road to a width of not exceeding 60 feet between Butternut Street and Blair Road.

I will state what is simply the purpose of the amendment. As it is now proposed, and as the bill now stands, here is what we would be doing if we pass the bill without amendment: We would provide for a street 110 feet wide to extend into a street 120 feet wide and then contract and finally end in a street 32 feet wide. I recently visited that section of the city, my attention having been called to the situation by residents there, and I have a blue print of the situation here if Senators care to examine it. That is a very beautiful residence section.

If the 120-foot development should be carried on between Butternut Street and Blair Road it would have the effect, first, of destroying practically the school grounds, the street line going almost even with the front of the school building and practically destroying the school grounds, and it would also necessitate the moving of a number of houses. The effect of the two amendments which I have proposed is that that part will be straightened out at the end of the extension, providing just as it does in the bill that the rest of it shall be 120 feet, but at the end of the square between Butternut Street and Blair Road, instead of being 120 feet it shall be only 60 feet, and even then the outlet is only 32 feet. It seems to me that the amendment is eminently fair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. I now offer my second amendment, page 3, line 2, after the word "Columbia," to insert:

And Piney Branch Road to a width of not exceeding 60 feet between Butternut Street and Blair Road.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia; and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Butternut Street, and for other purposes."

Mr. WILLIS. I ask to have printed in the Record at this point a resolution passed by the Takoma Park Citizens' Association with reference to the bill.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

A resolution passed by the Takoma Park Citizens' Association on February 11, 1924, in regular meeting assembled.

Whereas a bill now before Congress, known as H. R. 4531 and as Senate 114, provides for the widening and extension of various streets, including Piney Branch Road from Georgia Avenue to Blair Road to a width of 120 feet, all the land to be taken from the west side of Piney Branch Road; and

Whereas, in the opinion of the Takoma Park Citizens' Association, such a width from Butternut Street to Blair Road is not needed for the traffic now on this street or which may reasonably be expected to pass on this street for many years to come; and

Whereas the widening of the portion of Piney Branch Road between Butternut Street and Blair Road would destroy all the yard and playground space now in front of the public school and would place the school directly on the street, would disfigure and ruin what is at present one of the most attractive streets in that part of Takoma Park, D. C., and would work unnecessary and unjustifiable hardship on the property owners on the west side of Piney Branch Road between Butternut Street and Blair Road, as well as impose unnecessary and unjustifiable assessments on all the near-by property owners: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Takoma Park Citizens' Association is opposed to the widening of that portion of Piney Branch Road between Butternut Street and Blair Road to a width of 120 feet, and hereby respectfully petition the Congress to so amend H. R. 4531 and Senate 114 as to order the widening of that portion of Piney Branch Road between Butternut Street and Blair Road to a total width of not over 60 feet; and, further, be it

Resolved, That the president of this association is hereby instructed to appoint a special committee to consist of Mr. Charles Johnson, chairman; Maj. D. S. Fletcher, a former president of the association; and H. K. Hobart, E. W. James, Jesse C. Suter, H. L. Thornton, B. G. Wilkinson, James Hetherman, J. F. Thomas, and Alex. McKenzie (amended to include Mr. Reynolds and some others), and that this committee be instructed to wait upon the proper committees in both the Senate and the House in order to convey to them the sense of this association and to take such steps as may be desirable to bring to the attention of these committees the unnecessary injury and damage that would be caused if the bills referred to were to pass without the amendment suggested.

ESTATE OF JOHN STEWART, DECEASED.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to revert to Calendar No. 76, the bill (S. 1867) for the relief of the estate of John Stewart, deceased, which was called awhile ago and passed over because I was not ready to report.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William L. Browning, administrator of the estate of John Stewart, deceased, late civil engineer, for extra compensation for services rendered by him to the Government in connection with the Potomac Flats case, the sum of $2,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator explain the bill?

Mr. HARRELD. The bill was referred to me as a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims, and I made the report. It happens that the Government had some litigation going on here in the District known as the Potomac Flats litigation. It appears that at that time Mr. John Stewart was a clerk in the War Department drawing a salary of $1,400 a year. He was requested by the department to make a special investigation of the records of the District of Columbia appertaining to the litigation known as the Potomac Flats litigation. He was assigned by the Secretary of War to do that work, in addition to his other duties, and to assist the United States attorney in the District of Columbia in getting the evidence ready for him to use in presenting the case. He was engaged in that work off and on for four or five years, and the result was, as I understand from the report, that the litigation was won in the court largely due to his efforts in digging up the old records concerning the litigation and furnishing the evidence to the United States attorney.

For several years he tried to get a bill passed allowing him $5,000 for his extra services. The War Department once or twice has recommended that $2,000 be allowed. The committee made a favorable report. He has since died and his administrator has been appointed and the matter is being conducted for the relief of his estate. The committee was of the opinion that the $2,000 was well earned and should be paid, owing to results in the way of benefits derived by the Government from his extra services.

Mr. DIAL. The amount seems to be excessive, judging from the report. On page 5, in a letter from the Assistant United States District Attorney for the District of Columbia, it is said:

These visits and conversations were numerous and seriously encroached, no doubt, upon time that would have otherwise been devoted to the ordinary work of this office.

It seems he just took whatever time was necessary from his other duties.

The encroachments upon his time were very considerable, as I have stated, but could hardly have reached the extent claimed, as I judge from my own experience, in the preparation of the case and in attending to the taking of the testimony in it.

The report all through seems to indicate that not so much time was taken as is claimed. It seems to me a bad precedent to allow extra pay for a man when he does the work by taking the time from his other duties. I do not know where we will land if we legislate along this line. I know the great proclivity of the Senate to vote for whatever is asked, but I am going to move to amend by reducing the amount to $1,000. In line 9 I move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,000."

Mr. HARRELD. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the report shows that very frequently he worked until after midnight on this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL OIL LAND LEASES—HARRY F. SINCLAIR.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] has a matter of highest privilege which he desires to present.

Mr. LADD. From the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys I desire to make a further report of Saturday's proceedings as approved by the committee this morning. I send the report to the desk and ask that it be read up to the place of the signing of my name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to present a report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, PROCEEDING UNDER SENATE RESOLUTION 147.

On April 29, 1922, the Senate adopted the following resolution (S. Res. 282):

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate:

"(a) Copies of all oil leases made by the Department of the Interior within naval oil reserve No. 1, and separately, naval oil reserve No. 2, both in the State of California, and naval oil reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming, showing as to each the claim upon which the lease was based or issued; the name of the lessee; the date of the lease; the area of the leased property; the amount of the rent, royalty, bonus, and all other compensation paid and to be paid to the United States.

"(b) All Executive orders and other papers in the files of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus, or copies thereof if the originals are not in the files, authorizing or regulating such leases, including correspondence or memoranda embodying or concerning all agreements, instructions, and requests by the President or the Navy Department as to the making of such leases and the terms thereof.

"(c) All correspondence, papers, and files showing and concerning the applications for such leases and the action of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus thereon and upon all the several claims upon which such leases were based or issued, all in said naval reserves.

"(d) And all contracts for drilling wells on naval oil reserves, date and terms of same, reasons therefor, and the number and date of the drilling of wells on private lands adjacent to oil reserves.

"Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be authorized to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate."

Thereafter, on the 5th day of June, 1922, the Senate adopted the following supplemental resolution (S. Res. 294):

"Resolved, That Senate Resolution 282 is hereby amended by adding at the end of said resolution the following:

"That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoenas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

And thereafter, on the 5th day of February, 1923 the Senate anticipating an early adjournment, adopted the following resolution, S. Res. 434:

"Resolved, That S. Res. 282, agreed to April 21, 1922, and S. Res. 292, agreed to May 15, 1922, authorizing and directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to investigate the entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate, and providing that the expenses of such investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and the same are, continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

"The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate, and after the expiration of the present Congress until the assembling of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate."

Pursuant to the foregoing resolution the said committee, on the 22d day of October, 1923, entered upon the investigation which it was thereby directed to prosecute, and having heard a large number of witnesses and taken much evidence, its right to proceed was challenged upon the ground that the power of the committee under the original and supplemental resolutions expired on the 4th day of March, 1923, with the close of the Sixty-seventh Congress. Thereupon on the 7th day of February, 1924, the Senate adopted the following resolution, S. Res. 147:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate:

"(a) Copies of all oil leases made by the Department of the Interior within naval oil reserve No. 1, and, separately, naval oil reserve No. 2, both in the State of California, and naval oil reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming, showing as to each the claim upon which the lease was based or issued; the name of the lessee; the date of the lease; the area of the leased property; the amount of the rent, royalty, bonus, and all other compensation paid and to be paid to the United States.

"(b) All Executive orders and other papers in the files of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus, or copies thereof, if the originals are not in the files, authorizing or regulating such leases, including correspondence or memoranda embodying or concerning all agreements, instructions, and requests by the President or by the Navy Department as to the making of such leases and the terms thereof.

"(c) All correspondence, papers, and files showing and concerning the applications for such leases and the action of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus thereon and upon all the several claims upon which such leases were based or issued, all in said naval reserves.

"(d) And all contracts for drilling wells on naval oil reserves, date and terms of same, reasons therefor, and the number and date of the drilling of wells on private lands adjacent to oil reserves.

"Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be authorized to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to ascertain what, if any, other or additional legislation may be advisable, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate."

"Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoenas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

under which the said committee has continued the inquiry begun by it on October 22, 1923.

That on the 22d day of March, 1924, a witness, Harry F. Sinclair, being called before the committee and being on the stand refused to answer any questions that might be propounded to him by any member of the committee, as set forth in the report made by the committee to the Senate on Saturday, the said 22d day of March, 1924, a copy of which report is hereto appended and made a part hereof.

That upon such statements so being made by the said witness, Harry F. Sinclair, questions pertinent to the inquiry being prosecuted by the said committee were addressed to the witness, as set forth in the said report so submitted on Saturday, the 22d day of March, 1924, which the witness severally declined and refused to answer, as therein set forth.

And now your committee reports to the Senate that the said Harry F. Sinclair, having appeared as a witness before your said committee, refused to answer questions pertinent to the question under inquiry, and is in contempt of the said committee and of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted.

E. F. LADD,

Chairman Committee on Public Lands and Surveys,
United States Senate.

BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE, PROCEEDING UNDER SENATE RESOLUTION NO. 147.

Harry F. Sinclair, called to the stand as a witness before the committee, made the following statement:

"I do not decline to answer any question upon the ground that my answers may tend to incriminate me, because there is nothing in any of the facts or circumstances of the lease of Teapot Dome which does or can incriminate me.

"In January of last year I was called before the Manufactures Committee of the Senate and produced all books and papers called for and testified fully regarding the lease of Teapot Dome and the organization of Mammoth Oil Co., which holds that lease. On October 28 last past I came before your committee and answered all questions put to me by your committee in respect to the lease of Teapot Dome and the organization of Mammoth Oil Co., and was excused. In the afternoon of the same day I was recalled and answered all questions put to me by your committee and was again excused. On December 4 last past I was called again before your committee and answered all questions put to me and had my auditor present, who also testified. I was requested to furnish the committee with certain papers and memoranda, which was promptly done. On December 27 last past I was again called before your committee and answered all questions put to me and produced all books and papers asked for by the committee. I was then excused until the 4th of January, on which date I again appeared and answered all questions put to me by the committee and produced all books and papers asked for, and I was finally excused from further attendance.

"Thus, it appears that I have been before your committee at five different sessions and answered all questions and produced all books and papers called for, and I was finally excused from further attendance. I went abroad on business which had been delayed owing to the necessity of my attendance on your hearings, as I had a perfect right to do, without secrecy and without evasion.

"When I appeared before your committee at these dates and answered your questions and produced all books and papers asked for, your committee was acting under Senate Resolution 282 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, which authorized you:

"To investigate the entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources."

"Since the date of my last appearance before your committee, and at the instance of your committee, the Senate and House passed Senate Joint Resolution 54, which has been signed by the President. I make that resolution a part of this statement:

"Whereas it appears from evidence taken by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the United States that certain lease of naval reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming, bearing date April 7, 1922, made in form by the Government of the United States, through Albert B. Fall, Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, as lessor, to the Mammoth Oil Co., as lessee, and that certain contract between the Government of the United States and the Pan American Petroleum & Transport Co., dated April 25, 1922, signed by Edward C. Pinney, Acting Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, relating among other things to the construction of oil tanks at Pearl Harbor, Territory of Hawaii, and that certain lease of naval reserve No. 1, in the State of California, bearing date December 11, 1922, made in form by the Government of the United States through Albert B. Fall, Secretary of the Interior, and Edwin Denby, Secretary of the Navy, as lessor, to the Pan American Petroleum Co., as lessee, were executed under circumstances indicating fraud and corruption; and

"Whereas the said leases and contract were entered into without authority on the part of the officers purporting to act in the execution of the same for the United States and in violation of the laws of Congress; and

"Whereas such leases and contract were made in defiance of the settled policy of the Government, adhered to through three successive administrations, to maintain in the ground a great reserve supply of oil adequate to the needs of the Navy in any emergency threatening the national security:

"Resolved, etc., That the said leases and contract are against the public interest, and that the lands embraced therein should be recovered and held for the purpose to which they were dedicated; and

"Resolved further, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed immediately to cause suit to be instituted and prosecuted for the annulment and cancellation of the said leases and contract and all contracts incidental or supplemental thereto, to enjoin the further extraction of oil from the said reserves under said leases or from the territory covered by the same, to secure any further appropriate incidental relief, and to prosecute such other actions or proceedings, civil and criminal, as may be warranted by the facts in relation to the making of the said leases and contract.

"And the President is further authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, special counsel, who shall have charge and control of the prosecution of such litigation, anything in the statutes touching the powers of the Attorney General of the Department of Justice to the contrary notwithstanding.

"This resolution, in effect, denounces the lease between the Government and the Mammoth Oil Co., of which I am president, as void because of fraud and corruption and for want of lawful authority on the part of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Interior to execute it. This is an assertion that under the 'rights and equities' of the United States the land covered by the lease of Teapot Dome belongs to the United States. The resolution further asserts that the lease was made 'in defiance of the settled policy of the Government, adhered to through three successive administrations, to maintain in the ground a great reserve supply of oil, adequate to the needs of the Navy in any emergency threatening the national security.' This is a definite outline of the policy of the Government with respect to the 'preservation of its natural resources.' The resolution further declares said lease is 'against the public interest, and the lands embraced therein should be recovered and held for the purpose to which they were dedicated.' This is a further definite declaration of the policy of the Government for the 'preservation of its natural resources.' It further provides:

"That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed immediately to cause suit to be instituted and prosecuted for the annulment and cancellation of the said leases and contract and all contracts incidental or supplemental thereto; to enjoin the further extraction of oil from the said reserves under said leases or from the territory covered by the same, to secure any further appropriate incidental relief, and to prosecute such other actions or proceedings, civil and criminal, as may be warranted by the facts in relation to the making of said leases and contract."

"The President was further authorized to employ special counsel to prosecute such litigation, and in a further resolution instituted in the House $100,000 was appropriated to cover the expenses incurred in such litigation.

"Thereafter the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did appoint counsel, who were duly sworn and took their office as special counsel to the Government authorized by said Senate Joint Resolution No. 54, and the said counsel by bill of complaint in the District Court of the United States for the District of Wyoming sued the Mammoth Oil Co., the holder of the lease, the Sinclair Crude Oil Purchasing Co., and the Sinclair Pipe Line Co., and applied for relief by temporary injunction and receivers, which was granted. In said bill of complaint it is charged in paragraph 28:

"In negotiating and concluding said agreement said Albert B. Fall and said Harry F. Sinclair, acting for and on behalf of the defendant Mammoth Oil Co., did fraudulently and covinously combine, confederate, and conspire, in the manner and in the acts hereinabove set forth and other matters and things, to defraud the United States of America:

"(a) By granting said lease upon said naval petroleum lands in violation of law;

"(b) To favor and prefer said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. over and above other persons desirous of taking lease upon said lands;

"(c) To insure to said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. the valuable right to receive and take to exhaustion all of the oil and gas which might be obtained from said lands in said agreement mentioned;

"(d) To lease the said lands to said defendant Mammoth Oil Co. by said agreement at an inadequate, improper, and fraudulent consideration."

"And thereafter the said special counsel, acting for the Government, made an official announcement that application had been made for the organization of a special grand jury in the District of Columbia for the purpose of inquiring into offenses and crimes growing out of the circumstances attending the execution of this lease.

"It is perfectly clear, therefore, from the language of the resolution that your committee, by reason of any constitutional power which it may possess, or by virtue of the resolution under which it is acting, is not now engaged, nor could it be engaged in an investigation 'with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources'; because the Senate, from whom you derive your authority, has unanimously passed upon all questions embraced within that authorization and exhausted whatever power or authority it had in the premises. It is further perfectly clear that the Congress and the President have made of the whole matter a judicial question, determinable solely by the courts of the country, and such question is now actually pending in the district court of the United States for the district of Wyoming, and whatever criminal act is claimed is about to be investigated by a special grand jury of the District of Columbia. With due respect to your committee I claim that you are without any jurisdiction to question me further regarding the procurement of the lease or the validity thereof or any fact or circumstance pertaining thereto; that such an examination of me by your committee would not only be clearly outside of your jurisdiction but would be, in effect, an examination before trial in a civil action between the Government and the company I represent by a body of men wholly unauthorized by law and in a wholly unauthorized manner. Or, if your examination should be directed toward eliciting facts concerning fraud or corruption your committee in effect would have constituted itself a grand jury as to a matter which Congress and the President, by Joint Resolution 54, have directed should be presented to the constitutional authorities of the country.

"I am the president of the Mammoth Oil Co. and as such represent all others interested in that company. I negotiated the lease of Teapot Dome and am responsible for those negotiations. Any pertinent question which your committee could ask would necessarily relate to the procurement of that lease and its validity. You and the body from which you derive your authority have already sat in judgment on these questions and remitted them to courts of proper jurisdiction. I shall reserve any evidence I may be able to give for those courts to which you and your colleagues have deliberately referred all questions of which you had any jurisdiction, and shall respectfully decline to answer any questions propounded by your committee."

Thereupon the following proceedings were had:

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Mr. Sinclair, I desire to interrogate you about a matter concerning which the committee had no knowledge or reliable information at any time when you had heretofore appeared before the committee, and with respect to which you must then have had knowledge. I refer to the testimony given by Mr. Bonfils concerning a contract that you made with him touching the Teapot Dome. I wish you would tell us about that.

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, on advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Since you were last upon the stand we had, Mr. Sinclair, before us a copy of a contract entered into between the Mammoth Oil Co., under which, or as a consequence of which, the Pioneer Oil Co. ceased to be a competitor of yours in this lease of the Teapot Dome. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, on advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. When your private confidential secretary, Mr. Wahlberg, was before the committee he told us about the loan of some stock of the Sinclair Consolidated Co. to one Hays. Will you tell us about that transaction?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer by advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Since you were on the stand last Mr. John C. Shaffer told us about an agreement between yourself and Secretary Fall, under which Mr. Shaffer was to receive from you a certain portion of the territory covered by the lease which you secured for the Mammoth Oil Co. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on the advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Mr. Sinclair, will you tell the committee where and when you met Secretary Fall during the months of November and December last?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer on the advice of counsel on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. On the 3d day of February, 1923, Mr. Sinclair, as my information is, you caused to be transmitted to the National Metropolitan Bank of this city from the National Park Bank of New York the sum of $100,000 payable to your order, which, on the 7th day of February, 1923, you transmitted to the Chase National Bank upon your direction. Will you tell us about that transaction?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel I decline to answer on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Information has come to the committee to the effect that you contributed 75,000 shares of the stock of the Sinclair Consolidated Co. to Mr. Hays, or to some one representing the National Republican Committee, for the purpose of making up the deficit in the account of that committee. Will you tell us about that matter?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel, I decline to answer on the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. The committee is still desirous, Mr. Sinclair, of examining the books of the Hyvas Corporation. Are you prepared to produce those books?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. On advice of counsel, I decline to bring the books before this committee upon the same ground.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer to prove by the witness, if he would answer, that, among other things—

"Senator SPENCER (interposing). Do I understand, Senator WALSH, that what you propose to put into the record is what you think the witness would testify if he did not claim exemption?

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Yes, sir. I propose to prove certain facts by this witness.

"Mr. LITTLETON. If I have any rights at all here—I am counsel for the witness—I certainly object to your putting into this record what you imagine the witness would have answered when he has claimed his rights here under the law.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. All right, Mr. Littleton.

"Mr. LITTLETON. I protest most earnestly against it as an outrage.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. I protest, Mr. Chairman, against any such remarks from counsel as an abuse of his privilege. Counsel yesterday, here by the courtesy of this committee, said that certain things that this committee propose to do were monstrous, and now we are told this morning that what I offered to do, with the privilege of the committee, is an outrage. That is an abuse of the privilege of counsel, and I desire the chairman to admonish counsel to that effect.

"The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the chairman that counsel went beyond his rights, both yesterday and to-day, in his statements.

"Senator WALSH of Montana. Now, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the witness, through his counsel, has objected and protested against the proposal which I make to set out what I expect to prove by the witness, I do not press my purpose to state the facts to the committee. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

"The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions?

"Senator DILL. I wanted to ask Mr. Sinclair whether he was willing to answer any questions about the services that Mr. Archie Roosevelt performed for his organization in reference to testimony given here since he was last before us.

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, by advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"Senator ADAMS. Mr. Sinclair, I believe in an earlier hearing you testified, in answer to a question, that you had in no way, and none of your companies had in any way, given or loaned anything to Secretary Fall. Is that correct?

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I decline to answer, on advice of counsel, on the same ground.

"The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions on the part of any member of the committee? Senator ADAMS, have you any further questions?

"(No response.)

"Mr. Sinclair, you are excused.

"Mr. LITTLETON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to put on the record the subpoena duces tecum which was served upon Mr. Sinclair, and ask that it be made a part of the record.

"The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection.

"(The subpoena duces tecum above referred to is as follows:)

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
"Congress of the United States.

"To HARRY F. SINCLAIR,
"Sinclair Consolidated Oil Co., New York City.

"Greeting:

"Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate of the United States on Friday, March 21, 1924, at 10 o'clock a. m., at their committee room in the Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject matters under consideration by said committee, and bring with you all the books and records of the Hyva Corporation.

"Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

Chairman Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

"(Indorsed on the reverse by signature of David B. Barry, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States.)

"Mr. SINCLAIR. I thank you very much, gentlemen.

"The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hays?"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I now move that the President of the Senate be by the Senate directed to certify to the district attorney for the District of Columbia the facts as reported in the report by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word or two in relation to this matter. This is one of the gravest matters that can possibly have the attention of this body affecting, as it does, the power to proceed in an orderly way to secure such information as it may need to aid it in the all-important task confided to this body by the Constitution and by the people. A contempt of a court, however humble that court may be, is always a matter of supreme importance. A contempt of this high tribunal can not be measured by any words.

An effort has been made, Mr. President, to impress the public mind with the idea, in the first place, that the power of the Senate of the United States to require witnesses to attend before it or before its committees in connection with matters of legislation, and particularly to require from such witnesses, as it is said, information of a "private" character and in relation to the "private" business of the witness, is involved in "very grave doubt"; that it is a matter that requires the adjudication of the courts and of the highest tribunal of the Nation. I suppose this is done with a view to expecting some leniency of action if it should be eventually determined that this power is reposed by the Constitution in the Senate of the United States. I do not think, Mr. President, that either of the questions suggested, or any of those which have been raised as a ground for the refusal of the witness to testify, are involved in this "serious doubt." I can not read the decisions touching the power of either branch of Congress to compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel witnesses to testify as suggesting in any way that the question is one of "grave doubt" that can justify anyone in attempting, as a speculative matter, to secure an adjudication upon the subject. I think it involves the very life of the effective existence of the House of Representatives of the United States and of the Senate of the United States.

For my part, Mr. President, I can not regard this offense against the dignity of this body as a light or trivial one, or the right to question a witness as being involved in such obscurity as to justify the suspension of the proceedings of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys in an important inquiry until, indeed, an adjudication of the question shall be secured from the Supreme Court of the United States. The witness takes all the chances, to my mind, of the extreme penalty of the law for his contumacy should it eventually be determined that his ground of objection was not well taken; and for my part, Mr. President, I shall hope to see him, if it shall be determined that the grounds of the objection are not sound, visited with the utmost rigor of the law. Moreover, if it shall be possible to consider his several refusals as each an independent offense, I trust he shall be given the limit of the law with respect to each offense.

Something was said, Mr. President, in the discussion of this matter the other day, for the purpose of mitigating the offense against the dignity of this body, to the effect that there is a serious question involved as to whether this body may inquire into the "private" business and the "private" affairs of the citizen and require him to produce his "private" papers and his "private" records for inspection. I do not regard that as a matter of any consequence at all. The humblest justice's court in the land may by process compel any man to come forward and to tell the utmost details of his business and to disclose the most private papers that he has in his possession if they contain evidence material to the trivial matter over which such a court has jurisdiction. The fact that these are private papers, the fact that they relate to his private business, does not excuse any witness from coming even before a justice's court and being interrogated with reference thereto if it has any relevancy to the matter under consideration. How much more, Mr. President, should a witness be required to disclose upon an inquiry prosecuted for the benefit of the people of this great country of ours whatever information he may have. How feeble and how futile is the suggestion that he ought not to do so because it appertains to his private affairs or to his private business. Of course, there is not anything of that kind involved in this matter, as I indicated to the Senate the other day.

There is just one other thing that I desire to advert to in this connection. The witness thus having defied and having flouted its authority openly, contemning its process and its officers and declining to say a word with reference to these matters, then rushes into the newspapers to tell the story that he declined to tell upon the witness stand. I shall not detain the Senate with an analysis of this statement given to the press, except to advert to two circumstances.

The witness has detailed that he was called before the committee five different times and that this would be the sixth time. It never occurred to me, Mr. President, that the power of a court to compel a witness to testify depended upon how many times he had been called before the court. Of course the statement is made for the purpose of indicating that the committee has been unreasonably oppressive in its conduct of these proceedings so far as this witness is concerned.

Mr. President, it is true that this witness was called five times before the committee, chiefly, however, by reason of the fact that the witness did not disclose when he was on the witness stand in the first place all matters within his knowledge material to the inquiry. Little by little the matter leaked out, and so the witness was called back again to obtain from him more information. Everyone who witnessed the proceedings will be able to testify that he did not tell anything more than he was obliged to tell in answer to the searching inquiries which were addressed to him.

Among other things, Mr. President, it was disclosed after he testified the last time that, in addition to having paid a million dollars, as I have heretofore advised the Senate, for fake claims to the Teapot Dome—a pure cover for the purchase of the silence of the Standard Oil Co. and its competitors as a possible potential competitor for these leases—it was disclosed that he paid another million dollars, or the equivalent thereof, to purchase the silence of a newspaper. He did not tell us anything about that million dollars at all, and we desired to inquire of him of the circumstances under which he paid that million dollars. It was to avoid inquiry into that and other matters that the objection to the jurisdiction of the Senate was made on Saturday last. Another thing the committee desired to inquire into was this—

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRELD. Do I understand the Senator to say that the statement published in the newspapers yesterday by Mr. Sinclair was not filed with the committee or made any part of its proceedings?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not.

Mr. HARRELD. I read the statement in the newspapers, but I also understood that it had been filed with the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not filed with the committee, so far as I know. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee, when he returns, as to that; but I have no information that it was ever filed with the committee.

Another matter the committee desired to inquire about was a subject that was not disclosed by Mr. Sinclair when he was previously on the stand, namely, that he had loaned Liberty bonds to the extent of $25,000 to Mr. Fall, who had secured for the Mammoth Oil Co. this lease.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. LADD], I see, is in the room at the present time. I will say to the Senator that inquiry has been made as to whether the statement by Mr. Sinclair published in yesterday morning's newspapers, in which he discussed many things, including the testimony of the Roosevelts, the trip to Russia, the employment of Mr. Fall in that connection, the loan of bonds to Mr. Fall, and the testimony of Mr. Bonfils, was filed with the committee or put in evidence.

Mr. LADD. It has not been filed with the committee, so far as I have any knowledge. It has not come to my attention nor has it been given to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is my understanding about it. I wish to read what the statement says about the $25,000 of bonds. After telling about his desire to have Mr. Fall accompany him to Russia, Mr. Sinclair says:

This is about three months after Mr. Fall had retired from President Harding's Cabinet. As he was then a private citizen and ready to resume the practice of his profession, I saw no reason why I should not employ him as legal counsel in connection with negotiations we were about to undertake with representatives of the Russian Government. Accordingly I set about securing his services, and, as we were to sail from New York on May 20, 1923, and that date was then close at hand, I instructed Mr. Zevely, one of my attorneys, to endeavor to have Mr. Fall either sail with us or follow us to Europe at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Zevely later advised me that if Mr. Fall was to leave on such short notice for an extended European trip it would be necessary for him to have a sum of money approximating $25,000 to meet certain obligations.

I do not understand that that means certain obligations which he would incur by way of expenses upon the trip, but certain other obligations, independent of the trip, because provision is later made for his expenses on the trip.

It was more convenient at the moment for me to let him have securities rather than cash amounting to $25,000, so I instructed Mr. Zevely, in case Mr. Fall should make the trip, to get the amount in Liberty bonds from my private secretary. I left for Europe before the matter was arranged, but was, of course, informed about it.

I wish to state, however, that there was not the slightest secrecy connected with this transaction.

But I desire to state in this connection myself, Mr. President, that Mr. Fall told us, and my recollection is that Mr. Sinclair's testimony was in accordance with that, that Mr. Fall had never received a dollar in any form from Mr. Sinclair.

I wish to state, however, that there was not the slightest secrecy connected with this transaction. The bonds were sent by express to the bank designated by Mr. Fall, and a letter was written by Mr. Zevely requesting the bank to place the bonds to Mr. Fall's credit.

It is obvious that no need was felt to practice concealment or subterfuge.

Mr. President, I wonder how the matter could be any more effectually concealed. What means did the committee have to know anything about this loan of $25,000? According to the statement here, Mr. Zevely, the private and confidential attorney of Mr. Sinclair, told Mr. Sinclair that Mr. Fall needed $25,000 to meet certain obligations. Mr. Zevely, by the way, made a trip clear out to New Mexico to interview Mr. Fall with reference to his going to Russia. It appears that the employment could not have been carried on by mail or by telegraph or that kind of thing. Zevely made a trip from New York clear out to New Mexico in order to secure Mr. Fall to accompany Mr. Sinclair upon the trip to Russia. So, I ask, what greater concealment could be practiced?

Mr. Zevely told Mr. Sinclair that Fall needed $25,000 to meet certain obligations. Mr. Sinclair tells his private secretary to deliver the bonds to Mr. Zevely. Mr. Zevely transmits them to a bank in El Paso suggested by Mr. Fall. Mr. Fall gets the bonds there. How could the public know anything about this? How could the committee ascertain anything about it except, as it did, by a rigid examination of Mr. Zevely, who was eventually forced to tell about the transaction?

I wish to state, however, that there was not the slightest secrecy connected with this transaction. The bonds were sent by express to the bank designated by Mr. Fall, and a letter was written by Mr. Zevely requesting the bank to place the bonds to Mr. Fall's credit.

It is obvious that no need was felt to practice concealment or subterfuge. Testimony has been offered before the committee regarding $10,000 which was advanced to Mr. Fall against the expenses of his trip to Europe. This money was paid by the interests concerned in the Russian transaction.

I do not care to comment further upon this matter, Mr. President, than to say that the offense is grave; it is undeniable; and the real question involved in it, if there is any question at all, is whether the Senate of the United States can compel a witness to come before it and give it such information as it needs in order to discharge the duties which are reposed in it by the people and by the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I do not want to delay a vote if the Senate is ready for a vote, but after the vote I wish to make some observations.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. On that motion the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

Mr. SPENCER. I wonder if a yea-and-nay vote is necessary?

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think there is a bit of objection to it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask what we are voting on. Is it on referring this matter to the District attorney?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Montana is that the certificate as provided by the statute shall be signed by the Presiding Officer and sent to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia.

Mr. CURTIS. A question of order only: Is that necessary? Does not the law require the Presiding Officer to certify without a vote to that effect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opinion of the Chair is that it is an automatic proceeding; but inasmuch as the Senator from Montana has made a motion, the Chair felt that it might be entertained as fortifying the automatic procedure under the statute.

The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, this matter was considered on Saturday. Perhaps the Senator from Kansas was not present during the discussion.

Mr. CURTIS. I was here for a few moments only during the discussion on Saturday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The idea advanced was that the automatic action of the Presiding Officer takes place only after it is determined, first, that the witness did actually refuse to testify, and second, that he refused to testify in answer to a pertinent question; and it seemed to some of us that those were matters that needed the action of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not for the committee itself to pass upon those two facts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would rather avoid that. The committee has passed on them. The committee has reported to the Senate that the witness declined to answer the pertinent questions that were addressed to him; but lest there should be any question about it, I ask the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the action is automatic; that the committee this morning having reported the facts in the case, the Chair should sign a certificate without further action of the Senate; but the action of the Senate might seem, as the Chair has previously suggested, as fortifying the automatic procedure of the occupant of the chair, and therefore the Chair entertained the motion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the Chair is eminently correct in his decision of the matter. The Senate unquestionably has the right to adopt a resolution or motion respecting the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the opinion of the Chair—that it is an automatic action which the Presiding Officer should take, but the Senate may express itself by motion or resolution if it wishes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if the report of the committee or if the motion which he submitted contains a finding by the Senate that the witness refused to testify?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it does not. The report of the committee finds that the witness refused to answer, and refused to answer pertinent questions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I am not familiar with the discussion that took place in the committee on this point. I assume that the committee has considered it, and thinks the present procedure is sufficient. If it had not been for the motion made by the Senator I should have thought that the Presiding Officer of the Senate, under the statute which was read by the Senator from Montana here Saturday afternoon, would have certified the matter to the District attorney, the language of the statute being in substance that whenever a witness shall have refused to testify, and that fact shall have been reported to the Senate, the President of the Senate shall make the certificate to the District attorney.

In view of the fact that the Senator has moved that the Senate direct the Presiding Officer to sign such a certificate, I wondered whether it had better be preceded by an acceptance of the report of the committee, so that it would appear on the face of the papers that the Senate certified that the Senate had found the fact that the witness had refused to testify. I assume that the committee has considered that matter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the suggestion of the Senator is quite pertinent, and I will modify the motion now pending so that it will read that the Senate adopt the report of the committee and direct the Presiding Officer, and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the Chapman case the committee submitted a formal report and made a formal recommendation, if it may be called so, a formal statement at the end, saying that the report was made so that the President of the Senate could certify the said witness for said failure to testify, and so forth. This report is not even entitled a report. It has no formal words of introduction and makes no formal statement in regard to the certificate at the end. I can find no evidence of further action on the Chapman case. My remembrance is that the Presiding Officer proceeded at once to certify the case to the district attorney. This report, so called, is simply an extract from the proceedings of the committee, as far as I can make out. I think it would work automatically; but owing to the character of the report I think the Senate ought to take a vote, formally accepting the report and directing the Presiding Officer to transmit the case to the district attorney.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems to me clear that the proposed action by the Senate now would simply mean that the Senate accepts what is submitted to it as a report of the committee and finds it sufficient upon which to base the step to be taken by the Presiding Officer of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The report of the committee consists simply of an extract from their record.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I only want to state that when the Senate now by its action directs the President of the Senate to make the certificate which the statute provides for that means that the Senate accepts what has been submitted to it as the formal and sufficient report by the committee and finds that report sufficient upon which to base its action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply wanted to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the action now proposed, as I understand, is based not only upon the paper which was read to the Senate Saturday afternoon, from which I think the Senator from Massachusetts was reading from the Record when he spoke—

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But upon a further report made this morning by the chairman of the committee, a voluminous report of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. I have not seen that further report, made this morning. In any event, I think it is perfectly proper that the Senate should take action.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, I do, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], as modified. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. As I am sure that he would vote on this question as I am about to vote, I feel at liberty to cast my vote; I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], but I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote; therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. TRAMMELL's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is unavoidably absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] is paired with his colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST]. If present the senior Senator from Kentucky would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are necessarily absent. If present they would both vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is absent on account of illness. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the necessary absence from the Senate and the general pairs of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]; of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 72; nays 1, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. WALSH of Montana as modified was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I want to lay before the Senate very briefly what the question is which will be decided in this proceeding which we have now instituted. I said Saturday, and I repeat to-day, that in my judgment the question is one not only of exceeding importance, but of grave doubt, as to the right of the Senate to conduct these investigations. I do not intend this morning to argue the question, but I do propose to present to the Senate the statements of the Supreme Court, so far as they relate to this matter, to sustain what I undertake to sustain; that is, that the question is one of grave doubt and of exceeding importance.

Senate Resolution 282, under which the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys has whatever power it does have, concludes with this sentence of resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be authorized to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources; and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate.

On Saturday last a witness came before that committee, and, when the interrogation of that witness began, he challenged the right of the committee to proceed, on three grounds. Two of them, I conceive, are of but transitory importance. The third is fundamental. He challenged the right of the committee to proceed, fundamentally, upon the ground that the Senate had no right to conduct an investigation and inquire into the business and conduct of an individual citizen, and compel him to produce his papers, and to submit himself and his book and papers to investigation by a committee of the Senate unless that investigation had to do with some one or more of the matters as I shall in a moment enumerate them in the language of the Supreme Court, with which the Senate undoubtedly had the right to proceed in investigation. In other words, he challenged at the beginning the right of the Senate to conduct any of these investigations for the mere purpose of securing information, even though that information was desired for the purpose of legislation.

In the second place, he challenged the right of the committee to proceed, because he claimed that in adopting Senate Resolution 54, which the Senate passed, and by which we authorized the President to employ counsel and to institute proceedings to cancel the leases in the naval oil reserves, we had completed our duty in the matter and had no right to proceed further. Whether or not that challenge is well taken does not touch or affect the main question.

In the third place, he challenged our sense of fairness in that he said in effect, Here I am brought to the bar of the United States district court in Wyoming in a proceeding which you have directed shall be instituted against me. I am ready to go there, and, to use the expression of his counsel, "to stand toe to toe" with the Government before that court. He continued, You have charged me with conspiracy to secure by fraudulent means leases from the Government, and I understand that a grand jury is empaneled, or is to be empaneled, to consider my alleged criminal guilt. I am ready to meet it there; but in fairness, I ask this committee that they proceed no further with my investigation here while these matters are pending.

I assume, Mr. President, that that challenge is also a mere transitory matter which affects this individual case, but which has nothing to do with the main proposition as to whether the Senate has the right to proceed at all in this class of investigation.

As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] well said on Saturday, so far as I know this question has never yet been decided by any court of last resort. There are one or two decisions which bear clearly and most interestingly upon the subject. The first one of them is a case which arose out of an action in the House of Representatives, where in the Sixty-second Congress they passed a resolution authorizing the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate and make a report as to the financial affairs and activities of national banks, interstate corporations, and groups of financiers, and, mark this, they did it expressly as a basis for remedial and other legislative purposes.

When that committee met they summoned Mr. Henry, of New York, to testify. He testified that the company with which he was connected were accustomed to form syndicates for the acquisition and sale of blocks of stock, and then in detail he referred to a particular transaction conducted by his firm and the allotment of the shares and the distribution. Then he was asked the question, "Who are those who compose the New York syndicate?" And he refused to answer.

He was brought before the House, and the House took the same action we have taken to-day and directed that the district attorney should proceed with the case. Mr. Henry was indicted, a warrant for his arrest was issued, and he was arrested; and then, before trial, before a court heard the testimony and had a chance to decide upon the facts in the case, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that his arrest was unwarranted and that the court had no right to proceed. That case finally came to the Supreme Court of the United States. Justice Lamar outlined the two contentions in that case, and his language is applicable to the case now before us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate Joint Resolution 4, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. SPENCER. I read:

The petitioner insists—

And I am quoting from the decision of Justice Lamar—that the resolution—

That is, the resolution of the House of Representatives—

did not authorize an inquiry as to the matter about which Henry refused to testify; that the facts charged do not constitute an offense under the statute; or, if so, that the statute is void. On the authority of In re Chapman (166 U. S. 681) and Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168)—

To which I shall refer in a moment—and other cases they insist that in the trial of contested elections, in cases involving the expulsion of Members or other quasi-judicial proceedings, the House or Senate may, like any other court, compel material and noncriminating disclosures, but they argue that in view of the provision of the fourth amendment to the Constitution—

And that is the amendment which guarantees the people's right "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable search and seizures"— neither House can compel a citizen to disclose his private affairs as a basis for legislation—particularly where, as in the present case, the witness was not contumacious but fully and freely answered all questions; had disclosed the fact that national banks and their officers were often members of the same syndicate and only refused to give the names of certain bank officials when the names themselves could not, by any possibility, be of assistance in shaping legislation. They therefore contend that the papers show on their face that there was no jurisdiction to issue the warrant on which he was held, and that Henry should not be subjected to the hardship of being removed to the District of Columbia to stand trial upon an indictment which affirmatively shows that no crime has been committed.

Mr. Justice Lamar then summed up the other side of the case in a sentence, which is the side that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys has taken in the pending case:

The Government, on the other hand, insists that Revised Statutes, section 104—

Which is the section under which we are acting in this proceeding—is constitutional and that Congress may provide for the punishment of witnesses who in answer to a question propounded by its authority fail to make noncriminatorial disclosures and furnish information deemed necessary as a basis for legislation.

In that case the Supreme Court said, We will not pass upon those propositions. We will let the trial court, before whom the case is to come, decide them in the first instance, as of right they ought to do. Said they in this language:

These important and far-reaching questions, though elaborately argued, should not be decided on this record in view of the rule relied on by the Government that such issues must primarily be determined by the trial court.

Perhaps the most significant case is the one to which I briefly now refer. It is the case of Kilbourn against Thompson. One hundred and third United States, 168. It also arose out of an action in the House of Representatives. Here were the facts in that case: The Government of the United States was a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co. in 1876, and there was a real-estate pool in the city of Washington that was involved in the settling up of the bankruptcy proceedings in the Jay Cooke & Co. case. The House did not believe that there was sufficient care taken to preserve the Government's rights, and they passed this resolution:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of five Members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said real-estate pool and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in such settlements, with power to send for persons and papers and report to this House.

Undoubtedly the basis of that resolution was that in some way the House of Representatives expected they would not only preserve the rights of the Government in that particular case, but that the information sought might be a basis for legislation to take care in the future of subsequent cases of similar character. Under that resolution the committee of the House of Representatives proceeded to investigate. They summoned a man named Kilbourn to answer a question as to where the members of the pool resided and what their names were. He refused to answer. He refused to produce, in obedience to subpoena duces tecum, the records, papers, and maps which the committee had expressly called for. Kilbourn was arrested by the Speaker on a charge of contempt, and was, by the sentence of the House of Representatives, committed to the common jail of the District of Columbia. He was released on a writ of habeas corpus, issued by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and then proceeded to sue the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives for his alleged unlawful imprisonment. When the case came to trial the court was presented with the proposition that the Sergeant at Arms could not be sued in such a case for damages because, admittedly, he had back of him the authority of the committee and of the House of Representatives in the resolution which I have read and that such authority protected the Sergeant at Arms in carrying out the order of the House.

A demurrer was interposed to the contention that he had a right to sue the Sergeant at Arms, and that came before the Supreme Court of the United States. Here seems to me as near a decision upon the pending question as I have yet been able to find. The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Mr. Justice Miller, said this:

As we have already said, the Constitution expressly empowers each House to punish its own Members for disorderly behavior. We see no reason to doubt that this punishment may, in a proper case, be imprisonment and that it may be for refusal to obey some rule on that subject made by the House for the preservation of order. So also the penalty which each House is authorized to inflict in order to compel the attendance of absent Members may be imprisonment, and this may be for a violation of some order or standing rule on that subject. Each House is by the Constitution made the judge of the election and qualification of its Members. In deciding on these it has an undoubted right to examine witnesses and inspect papers subject to the usual rights of witnesses in such cases, and it may be that a witness would be subject to like punishment at the hands of a body engaged in trying a contested election for refusing to testify that he would if the case were pending before a court of justice.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator to ask him a question at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLASS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SPENCER. I am in the midst of reading a decision of the Supreme Court. If the Senator will allow me to conclude the quotation, I shall be glad to answer any question he may wish to ask.

The House of Representatives has the sole right to impeach officers of the Government and the Senate to try them. Where the question of such impeachment is before either body acting in its proper sphere on that subject we see no reason to doubt the right to compel the attendance of witnesses and their answer to proper questions in the same manner and by the use of the same means as courts of justice can in like cases.

There is where it is contended the right of the Senate or House of Representatives to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses ended, for the court continues:

Whether the power of punishment in either House, by fine or imprisonment, goes beyond this point we are sure that no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House unless his testimony is required in the matter into which that House has jurisdiction to inquire.

The court had just enumerated the cases in which in their judgment the House or the Senate had the right to inquire.

And we feel equally sure that neither of those bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen.

Again Justice Miller said, in this case—

In looking to the preamble and resolution under which the committee acted before which Mr. Kilbourn refused to testify, we are of opinion—

And note that the committee was acting under a resolution of the House of Representatives in connection with a matter in which the Government was directly interested and which had back of it, therefore, not only the interests of the Government in that particular matter, but had also the main question that it might be helpful as a basis for future legislation to remedy similar defects in the future.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Colorado wait until I finish, and then I shall be glad to yield. The court said:

We are of opinion that the House of Representatives not only exceeded the limit of its authority, but assumed a power which could only be properly exercised by another branch of the Government, because the power was in its nature clearly judicial. The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain. If what we have said of the division of the powers of the Government among the three departments be sound, this is equivalent to a declaration that no judicial power is vested in the Congress, or either branch of it, save in the cases specifically enumerated, to which we have referred.

In the case of Pacific Railway Co., Thirty-second Federal Reporter, 241—

Mr. KING, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. ADAMS addressed the Chair. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator two questions. First, did not the Senator vote for the motion which was adopted a few moments ago; and, secondly, if he did vote for it, what profit is there to read from the decisions, because evidently the Senator is contradicting his vote.

Mr. SPENCER. The second question as to the need of relevancy of anything said on the floor of the Senate coming from the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] astounds me. As to the first question, it is undoubtedly true that I voted for the motion, and I am exceedingly glad that the question is now to be presented to the judicial department of Government for what, I hope, will be a final decision. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. The question I wish to propound to the Senator from Missouri is whether the decision in the Kilbourn case does not contain a specific paragraph in which the court declared that it did not pass and did not propose to pass upon the very question which the Senator is discussing—that is, the right of the Senate to appoint a committee in order to secure information.

Mr. SPENCER. I think there is a great deal of truth in what the Senator has stated. I would not have put it in quite the same way that he has, but undoubtedly the Kilbourn case did definitely not decide the question which is before us. I said so at the beginning.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is reading from the case. Is there not such a paragraph in the reported decision?

Mr. SPENCER. I am reading from the case, and I am reading paragraphs contained in the decision of Justice Miller in deciding that case not for the purpose of showing that the case was decisive of the present question, but as indicating the trend of mind of the Supreme Court in discussing the question and as emphasizing the doubt connected with it and its exceeding importance. I do not pretend to say the question has been decided.

Mr. ADAMS. I think I recall a specific paragraph of the opinion in which the judge rendering the opinion specifically declared that the court did not propose to pass upon this particular question.

Mr. SPENCER. The decision of the court was that the claim that the Sergeant at Arms could not be sued was a claim not well founded, and therefore the court sent the case back, in order that Kilbourn might proceed with his suit for damages against the Sergeant at Arms, and that could not have been done unless the Sergeant at Arms was acting under an authority that was absolutely void.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has made the suggestion which was in my mind. I think the Supreme Court in the case of Kilbourn against Thompson, at page 189, specifically excepts from its decision the proposition which is now before the Senate. The court said:

This latter proposition—

That is the proposition with reference to aid of legislation—

This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case, because we are able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function.

Mr. SPENCER. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Let me read just one other sentence from the bottom of page 194, where the court said:

The resolution adopted as a sequence of this preamble contains no hint of any intention of final action by Congress on the subject. In all the argument of the case no suggestion has been made of what the House of Representatives or the Congress could have done in the way of remedying the wrong or securing the creditors of Jay Cooke & Co., or even the United States. Was it to be simply a fruitless investigation into the personal affairs of individuals? If so, the House of Representatives had no power or authority in the matter more than any other equal number of gentlemen interested for the Government of their country. By "fruitless" we mean that it could result in no valid legislation on the subject to which the inquiry referred.

I think that the case specifically in two or three instances excepts the question which is now before us from the decision of the court.

Mr. SPENCER. I am very glad the Senator from Idaho read those excerpts from the decision. It is a very long decision, or I should like to have it all printed in the Record. I do not think the decision anywhere specifically decides the question with which the Senate is now concerned, because, as the Senator from Idaho indicated in what he has read, the question then before the Supreme Court could be decided and was decided without passing directly upon the powers of Congress or of either branch of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Missouri is a member of the committee, I think?

Mr. SPENCER. I have very recently become a member.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator believe that the witness Sinclair ought to be required to answer the questions?

Mr. SPENCER. I will be very frank with the Senator from Tennessee and say that my mind is not yet made up upon the question as to the right of the Senate to require a witness to answer questions affecting his private papers or business. My point is that it is not a matter to be lightly passed upon. Fortunately it is now on its way to what I hope will be a final judicial decision; but, if I may say so to the Senator from Tennessee, it is a question of real doubt and of great importance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if it is a question of real doubt and, as I understand, the Senator from Missouri voted in the committee against requiring the witness to answer, why did the Senator vote a while ago in favor of now requiring him to answer?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked me that same question, and I did not give him the reason. I will, however, give the reason.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad if the Senator will do so.

Mr. SPENCER. My vote in the Senate was based on the assumption that the action taken will facilitate a final judicial decision upon this question, which is of the utmost importance to the Senate. I shall be glad to do anything to facilitate that decision. I think the question is not clear. I myself can not say to-day whether the Senate has that power or whether it has not; and the Senator from Tennessee will agree with me that it is a matter of extreme importance that we should know what constitutional power the Senate has in such a matter. That is the reason why I voted for the motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator another question. I ask if the Senator so voted to facilitate the settlement of this question, and that if it is a matter of great importance, why did the Senator vote in the committee against requiring the witness to answer?

Mr. SPENCER. As I recall, there was no division in the committee about requiring the witness to answer.

Mr. McKELLAR. The newspapers reported that there was and reported the Senator from Missouri as voting against requiring the witness to answer.

Mr. SPENCER. It may be so, and I shall be glad to explain to the Senator from Tennessee the reason for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator voted in committee against requiring the witness to answer, he was not thereby facilitating the settlement of the question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I shall be glad to state the proceedings in the committee.

Mr. SPENCER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Upon the reading by the witness of his statement and raising his objections to testifying, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] moved that the objection of the witness be sustained, and I think a yea and nay vote was taken, although I do not recall with certainty.

Mr. SPENCER. Was there not some modification of the motion of the Senator from Oregon, which I recollect as the Senator from Montana says; but my recollection is that to the motion as originally proposed there was some amendment with regard to matters that had already been decided or that were now in court. I may be wrong, however, in my recollection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] proposed that the examination of the witness be confined to matters other than those which might have some bearing upon the pending lawsuit.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Montana may be quite right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The motion to which I have referred, however, did not obtain. The question came up under the objection of Mr. Sinclair to testifying in accordance with his written statement.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Montana may be quite right.

I now wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I do not remember the vote to sustain the objection, made to the further testimony of the witness, but I do know that in my mind was not all the question as to the abstract right of the Senate to conduct the examination but was a sense of fairness, for, I am free to say, the contention of the witness appealed to me strongly as presented to the committee that while this man was now being sued in a civil case at our instance and was threatened with a criminal proceeding by the grand jury, it was unfair to subject him to an examination and require him to answer questions that might be of vital importance to him in either the civil or the criminal case or in both.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, Mr. President, if that was a valid reason on Saturday, surely it would be a valid reason on to-day, Monday. The Senator felt one way on Saturday and exactly the contrary way to-day. If the witness comes in and answers, in response to the Senator's vote and other Senators' votes, then the Senator will be doing him a grave injustice by his vote to-day, if the Senator is correct.

Mr. SPENCER. Either I did not make myself clear or the Senator from Tennessee does not understand me, for, while I was quite willing that the examination of the witness should be postponed pending the trial of the cases against him in court, yet, when the committee insisted upon his testifying, I am glad to hear the right of the committee in the matter passed upon by the courts. In either event, it does not affect the main question. Mr. President, I will proceed further with this matter.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is it possible to define legally where an inquiry or investigation begins or stops in the matter of contributing to information for legislative relief? I do not know whether or not I make my point entirely plain, but, as I followed the reading of the decision, the court seemed to hesitate on the question of how far an investigating committee can go. How is it possible, in other words, legally to define when an inquiry ceases to secure the information that would be necessary for the preparation and enactment of legislation?

Mr. SPENCER. I should say to the Senator that it is entirely possible to define or limit the investigating power of the Senate. Its expediency rather would be the question. Undoubtedly, in any investigation that the Senate may institute, in this or in any other matter, most of the information which it seeks to get will be voluntarily and patriotically given. The question arises as to how far the Senate is empowered to require a citizen to come any distance, and at any cost or inconvenience, and compel him to disclose his papers and personal matter that are private to himself for the purpose merely of giving information to the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Then, as I follow the Senator, his viewpoint is that it is more a matter of common fairness on the part of the committee than that it can be clearly defined by the courts?

Mr. SPENCER. No; I think the courts can clearly define it, and I hope in this case there will be a clear line laid down by the Supreme Court, when this case comes before them, as to whether the Senate of the United States has power, for example, not only to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses in regard to matters such as contested elections or disorderly behavior or enforcing its own rules, but that it also has the power to compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses as to any matter concerning which, in its judgment, it is necessary to secure information in order to legislate. If the Supreme Court decides that the Senate has such full power of investigation there can be no question that this witness would be in contempt in this case, and the rule would be laid down clearly for the future. It seems to me extremely desirable that we have a distinct decision as to the limitation of our constitutional right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I find by reference to the record that I was confused in my recollection, having in mind some proceedings that were had in connection with the testimony of Mr. Hays and not Mr. Sinclair. I have the record now, and I advise the Senate that before Mr. Sinclair made his statement the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] said:

My motion was that in the examination the inquiry shall not relate to pending controversies before any of the Federal courts in which Mr. Sinclair is a defendant, and which questions would involve his defense.

Upon that motion of Senator BURSUM a roll call was had.

Senator CAMERON. What are we voting on? I would like to find out. We are down here so far that we can not hear anything. Are we voting on the amendment of Senator BURSUM?

The question then came on the motion of Senator BURSUM.

The yeas were BURSUM and CAMERON; the nays were SPENCER, PITTMAN, JONES of New Mexico, KENDRICK, WALSH of Montana, ADAMS, DILL, and LADD.

Then the question was raised as to whether Mr. Sinclair should testify at all or not, and upon that the vote was unanimous that he should be required to testify.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I desire briefly to call attention to two other cases. On March 30, 1887, Congress passed a law authorizing an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding the accounts and methods of railroads which had received aid from the United States. The commissioners called before them Leland Stanford, who was president of the Central Pacific Railroad Co., and asked him certain questions. He refused to answer them, and the case came up before the Circuit Court for the Northern District of California as to whether the commission had the power to ask the questions and as to whether the witness was right in declining to answer. I only wish to read a paragraph from the court's decision to emphasize the one point I am making, and that is that the question is one of grave doubt and of exceeding importance.

The Circuit Court for the Northern District of California said:

The Pacific Railway Commission is not a judicial body and possesses no judicial powers under the act of Congress of March 3, 1887, creating it, and can determine no rights of the Government or of the corporations whose affairs it is appointed to investigate.

Then this sentence:

Congress can not compel the production of private books and papers of citizens for its inspection except in the course of judicial proceedings or in suits instituted for that purpose, and then only upon averments that its rights in some way depend upon evidence therein contained.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, did that refer only to the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the powers of Congress itself in the conduct of an investigation?

Mr. SPENCER. In that instance Congress had expressly referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission the investigation of this question; and the Interstate Commerce Commission, in carrying out that authority, asked these questions which the witness refused to answer.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; but did not the court decide in that case that Congress had only given such powers, thus and so, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that those powers did not embrace the powers sought to be exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission in that very case?

Mr. SPENCER. Perhaps this will answer it: The court, continuing, said:

Congress can not empower a commission to investigate the private affairs, books, and papers of the officers and employees of corporations indebted to the Government, as to their relations to other companies with which such corporations have had dealings, except so far as such officers and employees are willing to submit the same for inspection.

It seems to me that that throws a distinct light upon this question.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will bear with me a moment, the court does not say or hint in any part of that decision that Congress itself has not the power in its examination to do what it is now seeking to do.

Mr. SPENCER. I quite agree with the Senator that the decision of the court in that case is not decisive of the case in which we are interested. It is merely a side light. In other words, the Senator believes that Congress might confer upon a commission greater powers than it has itself. It is quite possible. I do not dispute it.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], in the record, referred to two cases, one of them Interstate Commerce Commission against Brimson, One hundred and fifty-fourth United States, the page of which he did not remember, but which is found on page 447 of that report, and the other the subsequent case of Harriman against The Interstate Commerce Commission in Two hundred and eleventh United States, page 407. He was of the opinion that these two cases practically decided the question that we now have before us. I do not so find on reading the cases. I leave them with a brief statement and a brief quotation.

Both of those cases had to do with railroads; and of course the railroad, as a quasi-public corporation, has a different relationship to the Government and to investigations than a private citizen has. In the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, in 154 U. S., to which the Senator referred, the only question that was up before the court was as to whether the statute which provided that the circuit court should punish witnesses who failed to answer the question of the Interstate Commerce Commission was a valid one—whether the court had the right to exercise that authority given them by Congress. It was contended by the court that Congress could not put that duty upon them; that it was an extrajudicial duty, and that if any witness summoned by the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to answer, even though the statute especially so provided, the commission could not come before the circuit court and seek its compulsory process to compel that answer or to punish the witness for not answering, and that was all that was decided in that case.

In that case, however—and with this I close—the court took occasion to make the following observation, which does have a distinct bearing upon the question which we will have decided, I trust, by the Supreme Court in the case we have now started on its way.

The court said:

We do not overlook these constitutional limitations which, for the protection of personal rights, must necessarily attend all investigations conducted under authority of Congress. Neither branch of the legislative department, still less any merely administrative body, established by Congress, possesses, or can be invested with, a general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen. Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168, 190). We said in Boyd v. United States (116 U. S. 610, 630)—and it can not be too often repeated—that the principles that embody the essence of constitutional liberty and security forbid all invasions on the part of the Government and its employees of the sanctity of a man's home, and the privacies of his life. As said by Mr. Justice Field in In re Pacific Railway Commission (32 Fed. Rep. 241, 250)—

"Of all the rights of the citizen, few are of greater importance or more essential to his peace and happiness than the right of personal security, and that involves, not merely protection of his person from assault, but exemption of his private affairs, books, and papers from the inspection and scrutiny of others. Without the enjoyment of this right, all others would lose half their value."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

Mr. SPENCER. I will yield the floor in a moment. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I just wanted to ask the Senator what is the document from which he reads?

Mr. SPENCER. I was reading from a memorandum that was prepared, as the Senator will remember, in connection with the Sinclair proceeding. It has some of these references from the decisions in a type easier to read than in the original volumes, which I have in my desk.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The brief of Mr. Littleton?

Mr. SPENCER. That is it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator permit me to read three paragraphs from that case which do not seem to have been included in the brief?

Mr. SPENCER. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do it. Will the Senator defer it for a moment, until I say another sentence? Then I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. ADAMS. I simply wanted it to appear in connection with what the Senator has read. I have no desire to do other than to add to the Senator's quotation from the case three paragraphs.

Mr. SPENCER. Then I yield now, and will defer my concluding observation.

Mr. ADAMS. In the Brimson case, the court says:

It was clearly competent for Congress, to that end, to invest the commission with authority to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter legally committed to that body for investigation. We do not understand that any of these propositions are disputed in this case. . . . Congress is not limited in its employments of means to those that are absolutely essential to the accomplishment of objects within the scope of the powers granted to it. It is a settled principle of constitutional law that—

"The Government which has a right to do an act, and has imposed on it the duty of performing that act, must, according to the dictates of reason, be allowed to select the means; and those who contend that it may not select any appropriate means, that one particular mode of effecting the object is excepted, take upon themselves the burden of establishing that exception." (4 Wheat. 316, 409.)

The test of the power of Congress is not the judgment of the courts that particular means are not the best that could have been employed to effect the end contemplated by the legislative department. The judiciary can only inquire whether the means devised in the execution of a power granted are forbidden by the Constitution. It can not go beyond that inquiry without intruding upon the domain of another department of the Government. That it may not do with safety to our institutions. (Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S., 700, 718.)

An adjudication that Congress could not establish an administrative body with authority to investigate the subject of interstate commerce and with power to call witnesses before it, and to require the production of books, documents, and papers relating to that subject, would go far toward defeating the object for which the people of the United States placed commerce among the States under national control. All must recognize the fact that the full information necessary as a basis of intelligent legislation by Congress from time to time upon the subject of interstate commerce can not be obtained, nor can the rules established for the regulation of such commerce be efficiently enforced, otherwise than through the instrumentality of an administrative body, representing the whole country, always watchful of the general interests, and charged with the duty not only of obtaining the required information but of compelling by all lawful methods obedience to such rules.

Mr. SPENCER. I thank the Senator very much for reading the quotations. They emphasize and illustrate at least one thing, namely, the doubt surrounding the question, and the necessity of final determination.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SPENCER. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I just want to get the view of the Senator. The Congress of the United States has invested the Interstate Commerce Commission, as just indicated, with the power to subpoena witnesses and compel them to testify in order to get information upon which it may very properly act. It has invested the Federal Trade Commission with the power to subpoena witnesses and to compel them to testify in order that it may get the information upon which it may act. It has invested the Secretary of Agriculture, in the matter of the stockyards act, with the power to subpoena witnesses and compel them to testify, so that that officer may get the requisite information upon which he may proceed. I suppose the Senator from Missouri will have no doubt about the power of Congress thus to act?

Mr. SPENCER. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And yet the Senator would take the view that it is a matter of grave doubt as to whether the very body that thus invests these commissions and officers with power to subpoena witnesses and compel them to testify has the right itself to get that information by the compulsory process?

Mr. SPENCER. Why, Mr. President, Congress is a legislative body. Surely the Senator from Montana has not considered this phase of it—that a legislative body, of course, can, by legislation, invest courts or commissions with authority to do things which it can not do itself. Congress can authorize courts of law upon certain conditions of facts to hang a man, but Congress can not do it itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; there is a difference.

Mr. SPENCER. Congress can separate a man from his property, as well as from his life, by courts or tribunals which it creates in its legislative function; but as a legislative body it can not perform those functions itself. The Senator must see the distinction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Montana recognizes fully the distinction between a court and a legislature. He has at least some vague idea of the difference.

Mr. SPENCER. I am sure the Senator has a clear idea.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I want to inquire of the Senator whether he accedes to the view that Congress, instead of vesting in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to establish railroad rates in interstate commerce, could exercise that power itself? In other words, have we the power to pass a bill providing for a 3-cent fare?

Mr. SPENCER. I should think so; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator, then, takes the position that we have the power to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the question as to whether or not we should establish a 3-cent fare rate, and to invest that commission with the power to subpoena witnesses and compel them to give it information which will enable it to judge of the wisdom or justice of such a rate as that, but that if the Congress of the United States itself attempted to investigate that question—if, for instance, the Senator from Oregon should to-morrow introduce a bill fixing the rate for transport of passengers in interstate commerce at 3 cents per mile, and that matter were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce—the Senator from Missouri thinks it is a grave matter as to whether the Committee on Interstate Commerce could compel witnesses to come before it and advise the committee of facts in their possession which would enable the Senate to determine whether it is a good thing or a just thing or a wise thing to pass the bill proposed by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Missouri hopes he will be in the company of the Senator from Montana when the decision of the Supreme Court is rendered in this case, for if by any chance the decision should be adverse to the contention of the Senator from Montana I am sure that in the fairness of his heart he would then agree with me that it was, as a matter of fact, a very grave question, and one that hitherto had been in great doubt.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am not fearful that the Supreme Court will consider it grave at all.

Mr. SPENCER. "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Quite true.

Mr. SPENCER. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that in the illustration which he gives he confuses an act of Congress, signed by the President, and thus a law, creating certain authority in commissions, with a mere resolution of one House of Congress to investigate for its own information. They are two entirely different propositions. I am not now referring to what a law of Congress might provide, but I am saying, as I conclude, that either House of Congress which attempts to bring a man any distance and compel him to disclose his private business, and books, and papers, merely to give one House of Congress information about something into which it desires to inquire, has presented a doubtful proposition and one of exceedingly grave importance.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I wanted to ask the Senator whether, if by any surprising chance—and to most of us it would be surprising—the Supreme Court should say that Congress does not have that power under the Constitution, he believes that the Congress ought to have that power and that the Constitution should be amended to give it that power?

Mr. SPENCER. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. DILL. I take it the Senator is not in favor of Congress having that power.

Mr. SPENCER. I would not say that to the Senator, but I would say, for myself, that I would prefer very much to wait until I read the decision of the Supreme Court and consider the reasons they may advance. Then it might well be that the Senator from Washington and myself would entirely agree as to any proposed amendments to the Constitution; but I do not intend now to say what ought to be done under those future circumstances.

Mr. DILL. I will say to the Senator that whatever reasons were given by the Supreme Court, should it decide that a committee of Congress did not have the power we contend it has, would probably be constitutional reasons. Whatever reasons they might base their refusal upon would be constitutional reasons, and I want to say to the Senator now that if they should give constitutional reasons why the Congress has not that power, I should be most heartily in favor of amending the Constitution to remove those constitutional reasons.

Mr. SPENCER. Again the Senator is referring to the power of Congress. What we have before us is the power of one branch, in its own investigation, not the enforcement of a law.

Mr. DILL. If one branch has it, both have.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, at this time I ask leave to submit for the Record a brief memorandum upon this subject which I have hurriedly prepared, and which gives a reference to some of the cases before the courts which have considered the subject. I ask that this be printed in the Record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The position of counsel for Mr. Sinclair is stated on page 2 of the "Memorandum respecting jurisdiction of Committee on Public Lands and Surveys," filed with the committee, as follows:

"A committee of the Senate or House, though authorized so to do by resolution, is not empowered to compulsorily compel witnesses to aid the Senate or the House in the discharge of its legislative duties.

"This practice has obtained in both Houses for a great many years, but has never been challenged to a final conclusion in the higher courts. The right to summon and compel persons to appear and give testimony or to produce books, papers, and documents is essentially and historically an attribute of courts of justice authorized to determine finally cases and controversies between litigants, and the extent to which the practice of committees of the House and the Senate has been judicially sanctioned is only in those inquisitorial investigations the right to conduct which is expressly conferred upon the House or the Senate by the Constitution of the United States or the one exception which is to enable either the House or the Senate to protect itself against decay or contamination by the expulsion of offending Members."

An examination of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States discloses no case deciding the question raised in this case.

In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168, 189), the court said:

"We are of opinion that the right of the House of Representatives to punish the citizen for a contempt of its authority or a breach of its privileges can derive no support from the precedents and practices of the two houses of the English Parliament, nor from the adjudged cases in which the English courts have upheld these practices. Nor, taking what has fallen from the English judges, and especially the later cases on which we have just commented, is much aid given to the doctrine that this power exists as one necessary to enable either House of Congress to exercise successfully their function of legislation.

"This latter proposition is one which we do not propose to decide in the present case, because we are able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function."

In Henry v. Henkel (235 U. S. 219), the court said:

"After argument the district judge discharged the writ, and an appeal was entered to this court, where the petitioner's counsel, renewing the objections made in the district court, insist that the resolution did not authorize an inquiry as to the matter about which Henry refused to testify; that the facts charged do not constitute an offense under the statute; or if so, that the statute is void. On the authority of In re Chapman (166 U. S. 661, 668), Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168), and other cases, they insist that in the trial of contested elections, in cases involving the expulsion of Members, or other quasi judicial proceedings, the House or Senate may, like any other court, compel material and non-criminatory disclosures. But they argue that, in view of the provisions of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, neither House can compel a citizen to disclose his private affairs as a basis for legislation, particularly where, as in the present case, the witness was not contumacious, but had fully and freely answered all material questions; had disclosed the fact that national banks and their officers were often members of the same syndicate, and had only refused to give the names of certain bank officials when the names themselves could not by any possibility be of assistance in shaping legislation. They, therefore, contend that the papers show on their face that there was no jurisdiction to issue the warrant on which he was held, and that Henry should not be subjected to the hardship of being removed to the District of Columbia to stand trial upon an indictment which affirmatively shows that no crime has been committed.

"The Government, on the other hand, insists that Revised Statutes 104 is constitutional, and that Congress may provide for the punishment of witnesses who in answer to a question propounded by its authority fail to make noncrimatory disclosures and furnish information deemed necessary as a basis for legislation.

"These important and far-reaching questions, though elaborately argued, should not be decided on this record in view of the rule relied on by the Government that such issue must primarily be determined by the trial court."

In Sullivan v. Hill (73 W. Va. 79 S. W. 870), the court said:

"The second ground, namely, want of authority to require petitioner to respond to the questions propounded to him presents a different question. If the subject of investigation covered by the joint resolution was within the range of legitimate legislative inquiry and the questions were pertinent thereto and not calling for privileged matter, the authorities generally agree that either House, if authorized, or a committee of either House, though sitting in recess, may summon witnesses and compel obedience thereto.

"(People v. Keeler, 90 N. Y. 463, 42 Am. Rep. 49; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168; In re Chapman, 166 U. S. 661; In re Falvey, 7 Wis. 630; In re Gunn (Kan.), 19 L. R. A. 519; Ex parte Lawrence (Calif.), 48 Pac. 124; People v. Learned, 5 Hun. 626; Ex parte Parker, 74 S. C. 466; and dissenting opinion in In re Davis, 49 Pac. 160, and cases cited and reviewed.)

"In Kilbourn v. Thompson discharge was ordered on the ground that the subject of inquiry was not within the range of legitimate legislative investigation. Whether if otherwise obedience to its process could be enforced as attempted was reserved and not decided."

In State v. Brewster (59 N. J. L., 665) the court said:

"In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168) the United States Supreme Court, in 1880, is supposed to question the broad liberality of the opinion in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat. 204), but the limitation, if any, imposed by the later decision, is that contained in this language of the opinion of Mr. Justice Miller, by which it is made obvious that the case for sub judice was determined only upon the consideration that 'the whole plea shows the House was without authority in the matter.' That such was the only differentiation is made clear by the language of Chief Justice Fuller in In re Chapman (166 U. S. 661). There the question was in some respects identical with that presented in the case at bar. The defendant was indicted and convicted under United States Revised Statutes 102 for refusing to testify before a committee of the United States Senate. The learned Chief Justice there held that Kilbourn v. Thompson was authority for the proposition 'that there exists no general power in Congress, or in either House, to make inquiry into the private affairs of a citizen,' but he declared 'the refusal to answer pertinent questions in a matter of inquiry, within the jurisdiction of the Senate, of course, constitutes a contempt of that body, and by the statute this is also made an offense against the United States.' The question of authority of the investigating committee manifestly, therefore, was resolved into a question of the jurisdiction of the appointing body, and the rule enunciated in Anderson v. Dunn remained unshaken, so that process possessing all the indicia of regularity issued by a legislative committee could not be attacked or questioned by a refractory witness for matters aliunde."

Willoughby on the Constitution, volume 2, section 750, says:

"In 1821 the Supreme Court by a decision rendered in the case of Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat. 204) recognized the existence in Congress of a general power to punish for contempt persons disobeying its orders, especially those with reference to the giving of testimony and the production of papers before its committees and commissions of inquiry.

"In the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168), however, decided in 1871, the court very much narrowed this power, holding that Congress had the power to compel information only with reference to matters over which it had legislative power, and that, therefore, it might not punish for contempt a refusal to testify or produce papers bearing upon other subjects. In this respect, being a legislature of limited powers, Congress could not measure its powers by those exercised by the English Parliament."

Willoughby draws the line apparently where Congress is investigating a matter over which it has legislative power and where it has no such legislative power.

Then he states the rule governing the State legislatures as follows:

"With reference to the authority of the State legislatures to punish for contempt, it may be observed that their powers are much broader than those of Congress. Possessing all powers not expressly or impliedly refused them, they have a general inquisitorial power and a corresponding general authority to punish a refusal to testify or to produce papers."

Therefore, Willoughby considered the question of the power to compulsorily summon witnesses to aid the Congress in the discharge of its legislative functions and not in the discharge of a judicial or quasi judicial function.

By his statement that the powers of the State legislatures are much broader than those of Congress, Willoughby clearly refers to the legislative powers of the bodies. Surely he did not refer to the power to try contested-election cases, or to the power to expel members of the body, or to the power of impeachment. Therefore, Willoughby takes the position that the inquisitorial power of a legislative body is coextensive with its power to legislate.

Cooley in his treatise on Constitutional Limitations, seventh edition, page 193, says (chap. 6, on the enactment of laws):

"Each House must also be allowed to proceed in its own way in the collection of such information as it may seem important to a proper discharge of its functions, and whenever it is deemed desirable that witnesses should be examined the power and authority to do so is very properly referred to a committee, with any such powers short of final legislative or judicial action as may seem necessary or expedient in the particular case. Such a committee has no authority to sit during a recess of the House which has appointed it without its permission to that effect, but the House is at liberty to confer such authority if it sees fit. A refusal to appear or to testify before such committee, or to produce books or papers, would be a contempt of the House. (In re Falvey, 7 Wis. 630; Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray, 226; People v. Keller, 99 N. Y. 463.)

"In the last case a statute expressly permitted the House to punish for such contempt. But the privilege of a witness to be exempt from a compulsory disclosure of his own criminal conduct is the same when examined by a legislative body or committee as when sworn in court. (Emery's case, 107 Mass. 172.)

"In the matter of Kilbourn (May, 1876), Chief Justice Carter, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, discharged on habeas corpus a person committed by the House of Representatives for contempt in refusing to testify, holding that as the refusal was an indictable offense by statute a trial therefor must be in the courts and not elsewhere. If this is correct, the necessities of legislation will require a repeal of the statute, for if, in political case, the question of punishment for failure to give information must be left to a jury few convictions are to be expected and no wholesome fear of the consequences of a refusal. The legality of the same arrest was considered afterwards by the Federal Supreme Court and was not sustained, the court holding that the House exceeded its authority in the attempted investigation." (Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168.)

It is to be noted that Judge Cooley discusses the question of the power to compulsorily summon witnesses in connection with the subject of "the enactment of laws," and not in connection with the subjects of the qualification of the members of the legislature, the expulsion of the members of the legislature, or impeachment proceedings.

Watson on the Constitution, volume 1, page 286, says:

"In Lilley v. United States (14 Ct. of Cl. 542) Richardson, J., delivering the opinion for the court, said:

"Either House of Congress, in discharge of the great powers and duties devolved upon it by the Constitution and as necessarily incident thereto, has the undoubted right to require the personal attendance before its committees, as a witness or otherwise, of any citizen of the country, to be paid or not, according to its own will and pleasure. Attendance in such a case is not by agreement, but is the voluntary or involuntary submission of a subject to a power of the Government, which must be obeyed, and which can not be resisted."

In Wilchens v. Willet (1 Keyes, N. Y. 521) it was held, quoting from the syllabus:

"When a person confined in the limits of a jail within this State is taken by virtue of the warrant of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to Washington to answer for a contempt in not appearing before a committee of the House, when duly summoned, it is not an escape from such limits.

The Court of Appeals said:

"Any extended examination of the question of the general power of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress to subpoena witnesses to testify before it or before one of its committees, and to compel their attendance from any portion of the territorial limits of the United States, is rendered unnecessary in this case by the full and unreserved concession of the learned counsel for the plaintiff of the existence of such a power in that body. That the power exists there admits of no doubt whatever. It is a necessary incident to the sovereign power of making laws; and its exercise is often indispensable to the great end of enlightened, judicious, and wholesome legislation. The power is rather judicial in its nature, but in a legislative body exists as an auxiliary to the legislative power only. In the earlier history of the country, from which our institutions, both of law and legislation, are principally derived, judicial and legislative functions existed in and were exercised by the same body. And when they were afterwards separated, and each came to be exercised by a separate tribunal or body, the legislative body necessarily retained a sufficient amount of the judicial power to enable it to investigate fully and to comprehend thoroughly any and every subject upon which the body proposed to act in its legislative capacity. This included the power to subpoena witnesses to give evidence to compel them to attend and testify, and to punish for disobedience and contempt in refusing to attend, or in refusing to testify upon attendance. The power to punish for disobedience and contempt is a necessary incident to the power to require and compel attendance. This is not denied by the plaintiff's counsel. He contends, however, that the only way in which the attendance of Williamson before the House of Representatives could have been lawfully enforced and secured was by habeas corpus to testify or to answer for the contempt."

This case was cited by the approval by the Court of Appeals in the case of People v. Keeler (99 N. Y. 463).

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Burnham v. Morrissey, reported in 14 Gray, page 230, states the following:

"The house of representatives has many duties to perform, which necessarily require it to receive evidence and examine witnesses. It is the grand inquest for the Commonwealth, and as such has power to inquire into the official conduct of all officers of the Commonwealth, in order to impeachment. It may inquire into the doings of corporations, which are subject to the control of the legislature, with a view to modify or repeal their charters. It is the judge of the election and qualifications of its members. It has power to decide upon the expulsion of its members. It has often occasion to acquire a certain knowledge of facts, in order to the proper performance of legislative duties.

"We therefore think it clear that it has the constitutional right to take evidence, to summon witnesses, and to compel them to attend and to testify. This power to summon and examine witnesses it may exercise by means of committees.

"Especial attention is called to this lucid statement of the law on this important question. Judge Hoar clearly includes the duty to 'acquire a certain knowledge of facts, in order to the proper performance of legislative duties,' among the several duties, the performance of which 'necessarily require it to receive evidence and examine witnesses.' And to this end the legislature may exercise its 'constitutional right to take evidence, to summon witnesses, and to compel them to attend and to testify.'"

That such power resides in the legislatures of the States generally, and that it is incident to the power to legislate, seems to be accepted without question by the courts.

It is unnecessary at this time to cite any cases on the subject other than the case of People v. Keeler, reported in 99 New York Court of Appeals at page 463. As this case discusses the subject rather exhaustively I quote from it the following:

"In the later case of Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S. 168), which was a similar action, the plaintiff had, on proceedings similar to those taken in the present case, been convicted of a contempt and sentenced by the House of Representatives to imprisonment. It appeared on the face of the proceedings that the contempt consisted of his refusal to answer a question propounded by a committee of the House appointed by a resolution, which was set forth. This resolution directed the committee to investigate certain business transactions in which the United States Government was interested simply as a creditor of one of the parties, and the Supreme Court held that the preamble and resolution under which the committee was appointed showed upon their face that the investigation ordered did not have for its object any legislative action, or the impeachment of any officer of the Government, but the collection of a debt owing to the Government, a power which Congress could not exercise, but which was vested only in courts of justice; that in ordering such an investigation the House of Representatives exceeded the limits of its powers, and consequently the committee had no authority to require the plaintiff to testify before it. On this sole ground the decision of the court was placed, but in arriving at this conclusion, several important points, which have a bearing upon the question now before us, were discussed in the highly instructive opinion of Miller, Judge.

"The case of Anderson against Dunn, in so far as it held the resolution of the House finding the plaintiff guilty, conclusive, was distinctly overruled.

"This decision necessarily involved the point, stated in other parts of the opinion, that a legislative body is not to be assimilated to a court of general jurisdiction; that Congress has no general power of adjudicating upon contempts. The reasoning and authorities upon which this decision is based convince us that it is incontestible. (Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 Ad. and EL. 1 [opinion of Coleridge, J.]; Killey v. Carson, 4 Moore's 4 P. C. 63; Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray, 226.)

"The case of Anderson against Dunn was also distinguished in Kilbourn against Thompson on the ground that as the plea in the first-mentioned case did not disclose the ground on which the plaintiff had been held guilty of contempt, it was no precedent for a case where the plea established by its recital of the facts that the House had exceeded its authority. It was also held, following a course of reasoning which need not be repeated here, that the right of the House of Representatives to punish a citizen for a contempt of its authority, derived no support from the precedents and practice of the two houses of the English Parliament nor from the adjudged cases in which the English courts have upheld those practices. That the powers of Congress were derived solely from the Federal Constitution, and that such as were not conferred by that instrument, either expressly or by fair implication, were reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people, and that while the House had power to punish contempts by fine and imprisonment in certain cases, it had no general jurisdiction on the subject, but was confined to those cases where the power was expressly conferred by the Constitution, or was necessary to enable the House to exercise its lawful functions. Express power is given by the Constitution to each House to punish its Members for disorderly behavior and to compel the attendance of absent Members under such penalties as the House may prescribe, and the opinion concedes that among the incidental and implied powers of Congress may be that of compelling the attendance of witnesses and punishing contumacious witnesses in the same manner as could be done by a court of justice, in dealing with cases which Congress is empowered to decide, such as the election and qualification of its Members, the trial of a contested election, and proceedings in the House to impeach officers of the Government. Whether their power over recalcitrant witnesses extends beyond those cases, the court, in reviewing the case of Anderson against Dunn, expressly declines to decide, but the court does emphatically declare that, whether the power of punishment in either House by fine or imprisonment goes beyond the specified cases or not, no person can be punished for contumacy as a witness before either House unless his testimony is required in a matter into which the House has jurisdiction to inquire, and that neither of those bodies possesses the general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen. To the like effect is the opinion of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Burnham v. Morrissey (14 Gray, 226). The House of Representatives has the power under the Constitution to imprison for contempt, but the power is limited to cases expressly provided for by the Constitution or to cases where the power is necessarily implied from those constitutional functions and duties to the proper performance of which it is essential."

"It must be borne in mind that the cases cited did not arise under any act of Congress authorizing either House to punish contumacious witnesses, for there is no such act. The question was whether a general power to punish contempts was inherent in Congress as necessary to the exercise of its functions independent of any statute. That such a power could be exercised to compel the attendance of witnesses in certain cases was conceded. Whether it existed in cases of investigations properly instituted for purposes of legislation was left an open question. So far as the statutes of the United States were concerned, a different course of proceeding was prescribed. The act of January 24, 1857 (ch. 19), provided that any person summoned as a witness before either House or a committee thereof, and refusing to appear or to answer any question pertinent to the matter in consideration, should, in addition to the pains and penalties then existing, be liable to indictment and punishment as for a misdemeanor, and it was made the duty of the President of the Senate to certify the fact to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, who was required to lay the matter before the grand jury. This act was incorporated with modifications in the Revised Statutes of the United States. (Secs. 102, 104.) The other pains and penalties alluded to must have had reference to the supposed power to punish for contempt. But if, as contended, no such power can be exercised by Congress under the limited authority delegated to it by the Constitution, the power could not be created and conferred by any act of Congress.

"The case now before us is entirely different. It arises under a statute enacted by the Legislature of the State of New York. The inquiry is not whether the power to enact such a law is to be found in the State constitution, but whether such legislation is prohibited or restrained by that instrument or by the Constitution of the United States. Except as thus limited, the State legislature possesses the whole legislative power of the State. (Bank of Chenango v. Brown, 26 N. Y. 460; People v. Dayton, 35 id. 380.)

"The power of obtaining information for the purpose of framing laws to meet supposed or apprehended evils is one which has from time immemorial been deemed necessary and has been exercised by legislative bodies. In this State it does not rest upon precedent merely, but is expressly conferred by statute (1 R. S. 108, secs. 1, 2), which provides that every chairman of a committee, either of the senate or assembly, or of any joint committee, is authorized to administer oaths to witnesses; and when the committee is by the terms of the resolution appointing it authorized to send for persons and papers, the chairman has the power, under the direction of the committee, to issue compulsory process for the attendance of any witness within the State whom the committee may wish to examine, and to issue commissions for the examination of witnesses out of the State. To subject a witness to punishment as for a contempt, the testimony sought must, as has already been shown, relate to a legislative proceeding. (1 R. S. 154, sec. 13, subd. 4.)

"It is difficult to conceive any constitutional objection which can be raised to the provision authorizing legislative committees to take testimony and to summon witnesses. In many cases it may be indispensable to intelligent and effectual legislation to ascertain the facts which are claimed to give rise to the necessity for such legislation and the remedy required, and, irrespective of the question whether in the absence of a statute to that effect either house would have the power to imprison a recalcitrant witness, I can not yield to the claim that a statute authorizing it to enforce its process in that manner is in excess of its legislative power. To await the slow process of indictment and prosecution for a misdemeanor might prove quite ineffectual, and necessary legislation might be obstructed and perhaps defeated if the legislative body had no other and more summary means of enforcing its right to obtain the required information. That the power may be abused is no ground for denying its existence. It is a limited power and should be kept within its proper bounds, and when those are exceeded a jurisdictional question is presented which is cognizable in the courts. My conclusion is that subdivision 4 of section 18, First Revised Statutes is constitutional and valid. These views are supported by the decision of this court in Wickens v. Willet (1 Keyes, 521, 525), where it was held that the House of Representatives of the United States had the power to compel the attendance of witnesses. In that case this court said, per Johnson, Judge: 'That the power exists admits of no doubt whatever. It is a necessary incident of the sovereign power of making laws, and its exercise is often indispensable to the great end of enlightened, judicious, and wholesome legislation. The power is rather judicial in its nature, but in a legislative body it exists as an auxiliary to the legislative power only; and further at page 526. The power to punish for disobedience and contempt in refusing to attend is a necessary incident to the power to require and compel attendance. (8 C., 4 Ct. of App. Dec. 596; 10 Abb. Pr. 164; 12 Id. 319.) It was in deference to this decision and to the case of People v. Learned (5 Hun, 626) that Westbrook, judge, sitting in the Oyer and Terminer, dismissed the writ of habeas corpus in this case, at the same time delivering a learned and able opinion in support of the opposite view, which has been of much service to the court in examining the case. The learned judge treats the case of Wilckens against Willet as based upon the reasoning in Anderson against Dunn, and the latter case as overruled in Kilbourn against Thompson, but a careful examination shows that the case of Anderson against Dunn was overruled in Kilbourn against Thompson only in so far as it recognized a general power in the House to punish for contempts and the conclusiveness of its judgment; while in regard to the proposition that the power exists for the purpose of compelling the attendance of witnesses as auxiliary to the legislative power, the opinion in Kilbourn against Thompson (p. 189), said in terms that that proposition was one which the court did not propose to decide in the case then before it, as it was able to decide it without passing upon the existence or nonexistence of such a power in aid of the legislative function. Throughout this Union the practice of legislative bodies, and in this State, the statutes existing at the time the present Constitution was adopted, and whose validity has never before been questioned by our courts, afford strong arguments in favor of the recognition of the right of either house to compel the attendance of witnesses for legislative purposes, as one which has been generally conceded to be an appropriate adjunct to the power of legislation, and one which, to say the least, the State legislature has constitutional authority to regulate and enforce by statute."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to take just a moment to call the attention of the Senate to the difficult and, it seems to me, embarrassing situation with which we are confronted in the presentation of this case to the court.

The action taken by the Senate provides that the President of the Senate shall certify the name of Mr. Sinclair to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, and that the case shall then be in charge of the district attorney.

The District attorney is an appointee through the recommendation of the Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty, and while the old investigation is not particularly concerned with Mr. Daugherty's fitness for his position, there has been sufficient evidence before that committee, and certainly sufficient other evidence before the committee investigating Mr. Daugherty, to make it an embarrassing situation. The relationship, to say the least, has been most close and friendly between Mr. Daugherty and Mr. Sinclair, and now, when for the first time, as the Senator from Missouri maintains, the question is raised as to whether or not the Congress has the power to compel a witness to testify at the instruction or request of a committee of the Senate, the matter is to be handled and presented to the courts by an appointee of Mr. Daugherty.

The junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] some days ago suggested in the hearing that under the present situation the President should suspend the Attorney General pending these investigations. It seems to me that now, when this question of the right of the committees of Congress to compel witnesses to testify is to be taken to the Supreme Court, the man who is to do it, namely, the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, should be freed from a superior who has had as close connection as Mr. Daugherty has had with Mr. Sinclair. I make no charges. I do not even criticize the United States attorney for the District of Columbia. So far as I can learn, he is an able and a fearless man. But I submit that in the very nature of the situation he can not be as free to prosecute this case as he should be. If some other man were Attorney General, or even Acting Attorney General, the embarrassment would be removed.

So it seems to me that there is an added reason now why the President should suspend Mr. Daugherty and allow this case to be handled, and the other matters of the Department of Justice to be handled, free from any possible influence on the part of the present Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It occurred to me that this would be treated as a part of this special transaction, and that the special counsel would surely look after the interests of the committee and the Senate in the matter. Does not the Senator think that is the case?

Mr. DILL. I think not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would think so.

Mr. DILL. I do not think so, for the reason that the law provides that the name of Mr. Sinclair shall be certified to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia; and the law would have to be changed if the special counsel, Mr. Pomerehne and Mr. Roberts, were to handle it. So that I do not think the Senator's suggestion is correct.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit, I realize the force of the suggestion the Senator makes, and I think there is a good deal in it, but I would think that at any rate those gentlemen would be named as special counsel in the case.

Mr. DILL. I think the District attorney might well do that, and I think it would be very desirable that he should do that. I think it would give the country more confidence, and possibly would give the Senate as a whole more confidence, if some such action were taken.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the Chair know what is going on in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Chair understands that Senate Joint Resolution No. 4 is the pending business.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yet it would be impossible, from the debate, to arrive at the conclusion that a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution is the subject really before the Senate.

I wonder where the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has gone, and I wonder where the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is? On last Saturday those Senators lectured other Members of this body for irrelevant discussion, and the Senator from Idaho expressed the fear that the Senate was neglecting its constitutional functions and duties in order to serve as a grand jury. To-day the Senate passed a motion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] referring to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia for action the failure of a witness to testify before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys in the investigation of the naval oil reserve leases. That motion was agreed to unanimously—no; the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] proudly and defiantly stood alone and hurled his negative vote in the face of an otherwise unanimous Senate. After the motion had been disposed of, after the Senate had lost jurisdiction of the question, the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], with characteristic inconsistency—no; with inconsistency unusual even for him—proceeded impliedly to argue that he had voted wrong when he voted for the motion of the Senator from Montana. Every word the junior Senator from Missouri said, every precedent he cited, was intended to show that the witness, Mr. Sinclair, was within his sacred constitutional rights when he refused to answer questions propounded to him by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

The Senate can not determine the legal question; it has referred the subject to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, as provided in the statute, for proceedings appropriate to compel the witness to testify, if, as a matter of law, he ought to be required to answer the questions propounded to him. It is therefore a waste of time now to discuss the question in the Senate.

I wonder how the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] reconcile themselves so easily to this waste of the Senate's time involved in a discussion by a Senator of a motion which had already been disposed of by the Senate, and in hearing an argument as to what the court's decision ought to be.

It is necessary and desirable that the investigations which the Senate has authorized should proceed to a conclusion, and it seems necessary and desirable in the public interest that there be brought out all the facts which involve the integrity or the dishonesty of transactions by which hundreds of millions of dollars worth of public property have been bartered away, or as has been said by this body in a solemn resolution in disregard of law, in violation of the public interest and the well-settled policies of the Government.

But the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], a member of the majority, and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and other Senators of the majority will have difficulty in explaining, if it is necessary to terminate investigations designed to expose fraud and corruption in order that legislation may proceed, why the time of the Senate should be wasted in debate over motions that have already been agreed to and in arguments as to what should be the decision of the court in cases which the Senate under the law has referred to the court, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] will have difficulty in explaining why he voted one way and argued another.

The pending resolution, a proposal by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to modify Article V of the Constitution, relating to amendment of that instrument, involves an important question of public policy. The amendment as presented by its author contemplates certain changes in the present Constitution as it relates to amendments. The first change proposed by the Senator from New York is that where the legislature exercises the power of ratification the members of at least one house in the legislature shall be elected after the amendment has been proposed, the object being, of course, to make certain that the members of the legislature who are to determine the question of ratification or rejection shall have been chosen with due regard to the proposed constitutional amendment which they are to ratify or reject.

The second proposition, as I read it in the proposal of the Senator from New York, is that if any State desires to do so it may require that the ratification by its legislature shall be subject to confirmation by popular vote. Under the present Constitution the question of ratification can not be submitted to popular vote. The revised language of that feature of the amendment has just been handed to me by the Senator from New York, and reads as follows:

That any State may provide for a popular vote to affirm or reverse the action of its legislature, such vote to stand in lieu of prior action of the legislature.

That is an improvement over the method of ratification as provided in the present Constitution. Now, if the people of the States overwhelmingly oppose an amendment submitted and in the face of public opinion the legislature sees fit to ratify it, there is no remedy except the choice of a new legislature, and that is not effective, since a ratification when once made is binding under the present Constitution and can not be changed by subsequent action of the legislature. It seems to me it is desirable to have a uniform process of ratification and that it is better to establish the method contemplated in the amendment known as the Walsh proposal, which requires that ratification of constitutional amendments shall be by the qualified electors of the respective States.

The third feature of the proposal of the Senator from New York is that a State may change its vote upon the subject of ratification at any time before the legislatures of three-fourths of the States have effected a ratification and made the proposed amendment a part of the Constitution. Under the present system a State having once ratified an amendment to the Constitution is not at liberty to change its action, or, rather, if it does attempt to do so its attempt will not be effective. It is also true that a State may repeatedly reject a proposed amendment to the Constitution; it may vote on it an indefinite number of times, and yet, if it finally ratifies, the action is binding and effective.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I gladly yield to my colleague.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is it provided that if more than one-fourth of the States shall have rejected it is then a final rejection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is a fourth important change. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York if the legislatures of more than one-fourth of the several States reject an amendment to the Constitution that operates as a final rejection of the amendment. Under the prevailing practice that would not be true. There is apparently an indefinite time in which the legislature of a State, having once rejected, may reverse its action and ratify.

The proposal carried in the Walsh substitute has also four important features, and contemplates four important changes in the present system of making amendments. Legislatures now ratify. Under the amendment the ratification must be by vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the States. That is the first important change. The second change is included, I believe, in the proposal of the Senator from New York, and is that until three-fourths of the States shall have ratified or not more than one-fourth of the States shall have rejected a proposed amendment any State may change its vote. The third change proposed in the Walsh substitute is that if at any time more than one-fourth of the States have rejected the proposed amendment such rejection shall be final and further consideration thereof by the States shall cease. That is closely analogous to the provision of the original amendment as presented by the Senator from New York.

The fourth important change in the method of making amendments to the Constitution as carried in the substitute or amendment is that any constitutional amendment hereafter proposed shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified within six years from the date of submission thereof by the Congress. Under the present practice there is no time limit. A constitutional amendment submitted now apparently may be voted upon 50 years hence if not ratified previously. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] informs me that there is now pending a constitutional amendment which has been pending for 50 years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One has been pending for 100 years.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from New York states that there is another amendment which has been pending for 100 years. Manifestly that system is wrong and ought to be corrected. Not even the Members of this body know what are the provisions or purposes of those amendments, and if the legislature of a State which has never voted to ratify it should now see fit to do so, it might make effective an amendment which has been pending for so long a time. It is proper and necessary that some limitation of time be imposed so that proposal for amendments which become obsolete and which are forgotten and are no longer issues may not be considered as pending and may not be the subjects of ratification.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that we have adopted the policy of providing a limited time in which an amendment must be accepted, by limitation of six years in the prohibition amendment. We are committed in a way to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. At least that is a precedent.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is not the law, but I think it is the policy.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe that the Walsh substitute, while it is in many features similar to the proposal of the Senator from New York, is preferable to it in that it provides a uniform method of ratification, namely, by the votes of the qualified electors of the several States, although I find no objection to requiring action by both the legislature and the electors.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator, before he takes his seat, submit to an observation or inquiry from me?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator overlooked—unintentionally, of course—that another very important difference between the so-called substitute and the original joint resolution, and a difference also as between the substitute and the present Article V, is the fact that the substitute abolishes the submission of proposed constitutional amendments to conventions to be called within the States. I make this observation in that connection for the Senator's consideration. Of course, we can not tell what is going to happen in the future. We only know that from time to time amendments of extraordinary importance are going to be proposed in Congress to the Federal Constitution, and that from time to time the Congress in the generations yet to come is more than apt to submit many proposed amendments to the States. I would not be at all surprised, if I live long enough, to observe such an instance; that an amendment of a very involved character might be submitted by Congress to the States. For example, there has been a good deal of discussion in this country—it has not as yet come forward very emphatically in the Halls of Congress, but there has been a good deal of discussion from time to time—as to changing the form of our Government in such fashion as that the Cabinet shall be responsive to the legislative branch in a more or less direct degree. That suggestion just comes to my mind as I try to project my mind toward the future.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me finish the observation.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it may well be, after we are dead and gone, that Congress will think it advisable to submit to the States an amendment involving a number of questions, each interlocking with the others, of a somewhat complicated character. I apprehend that the men who wrote Article V of the Constitution back in 1787 figured that the only way in which the people of the States could give thorough and comprehensive consideration to an involved, interlocking set of subjects in a single amendment was through the election of delegates to conventions called by the States, just as was done when the original Constitution was ratified by the thirteen original States in 1789.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield in just a moment. Does not the Senator from Arkansas believe—

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe I have the floor. However, I make no objection to the interruption. I merely wanted to point out to the Senator from New York that his very interesting statement is based upon the theory that the proposed substitute does not permit of conventions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is mistaken about that in so far as the copies of the joint resolution which are available to my use are concerned. For instance, I read as follows:

Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, upon the application of two-thirds of the legislatures of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a national convention. If the Senator will turn to page 2, and read the language of article 2 as now existing, he will find that it reads:

The Congress, . . . shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of this Constitution, when ratified by three-fourths of the several States through their legislatures or conventions.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. So it was the latter convention to which the Senator referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I was referring to. The Walsh substitute denies to the people of a State the right to call a convention composed of delegates elected solely for the purpose of considering an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON. The convention process of ratification has never been resorted to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would seem, therefore, not to have been approved by experience and not to be necessary. Of course, the Senator's argument implies that conditions may change—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. That they are changing, and that the present provision of the Constitution which has not been invoked and which has never been regarded as useful may hereafter, by reason of changed conditions, become necessary; but I think, Mr. President, that the process of ratification contemplated in the amendment which is called the Walsh substitute for convenience, is more in conformity to the desires of the public and will work every beneficial result that could be accomplished through the convention plan, which, as I have already said, has never been resorted to. There is, however, distinction between the two proposals in that particular.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire, if I may, to submit an inquiry to the Senator from New York. That inquiry relates particularly to the authority which determines the method of ratification. I have here his modified resolution. On page 2, beginning in the middle of the sentence, it reads:

. . . which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by three-fourths of the several States through their legislatures or conventions, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress or the convention.

The Senator will note that there is a material change there as compared with the original constitutional provision which reads:

. . . which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

In other words, the Constitution as it now stands places in Congress entirely the authority to determine upon the mode of ratification, while the Senator from New York proposes to transfer that, so that the convention, if there shall be one, shall have authority to determine. I wondered what reason there was for that change.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is no change in the meaning. Under Article V of the Constitution as written to-day there are two methods of initiating an amendment to the Federal Constitution:

First, it may be initiated in the Congress at Washington; or, second, upon the petition of two-thirds of the States, it may be initiated in a national convention called for the purpose. When an amendment is initiated in a national convention the amendment is submitted by that convention directly to the State legislatures or to State conventions.

Mr. WILLIS. That is all a matter of theory, of course, because we never have utilized such a process as that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under Article V of the Constitution as existing to-day in the case of amendments originating in the Congress—and all of them thus far have originated in the Congress—Congress decides whether the amendment shall be submitted to the legislatures of the States or to conventions called in each of the States. The language of the joint resolution which is printed on page 2 maintains exactly that same relation.

Mr. WILLIS. I may be obtuse, but I can not see that the Senator has made that clear. As the Constitution now stands, the authority resides in Congress to determine whether the ratification shall be by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. The Congress itself has that authority. The Senator's amendment proposes to divide the authority which now rests entirely in Congress with a convention, because, if the Senator will note the language of his amendment, he will see that it is quite different from the language in the Constitution. I call his attention particularly to lines 9 and 10 of his amendment, which read:

As the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress—

If he would stop right there he would have the language the same as it is in the Constitution, but his amendment says, "or the convention."

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the national convention.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that it is the national convention; but that is different from the language which is now contained in the Constitution. I wonder if there is any reason for that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator will find that the language is not different in the article of the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator from New York is mistaken; the language is quite different. At the risk of being tedious, I desire to make a further statement. The Constitution now provides that Congress itself shall determine whether ratification shall be by legislatures of three-fourths of the States or by conventions in three-fourths of the States. The language is very clear. I read from the Constitution, as found in the manual, on page 386, beginning in media res—which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

The Senator says in his amendment "by the Congress or the convention." Unless he desires to change it otherwise or can give some good reason for it, I think he ought to strike out those three words, "or the convention." In other words, I think it desirable to retain in the Congress the power that is now there. At the appropriate time I shall move to strike out those words, because, in my opinion, there is no reason for that change.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The present Constitution provides that Congress may submit proposed constitutional amendments to conventions or to the legislatures.

Mr. WILLIS. I so understand.

Mr. SHIELDS. What would the Senator say to an amendment to strike out the provision that Congress may submit proposed amendments to the legislatures so that the only manner in which an amendment might be ratified would be by a convention of delegates elected in the several States, which is the alternative method now provided and is the manner in which the Constitution originally was ratified?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not see any good reason for making such a change. I can see a reason, in fact several reasons, for the adoption of the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from New York, but I think it is safe to retain in Congress the power that it has heretofore possessed. There is not any reason for changing the grant of power as it exists in the present fifth amendment, and I trust the Senator from New York will not oppose it if I shall offer an amendment to strike out the words to which I have referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I misunderstood at the beginning of the Senator's observation to just what he was referring. He now asks me why power should be given to a national convention. I use that descriptive phrase in order to differentiate between State and national conventions. I believe that power should be given to a national convention to prescribe the method of ratification. Here is the point which the authors of this change have in mind. In cases where Congress has had nothing whatsoever to do with originating an amendment, in cases where the movement has originated in the States themselves, followed by a petition joined in by two-thirds of all the States, and a national convention shall be held, it seems logical that the Congress should stay out of the picture.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, the Congress is in the picture; there can not be a national convention except when Congress calls it. Congress is already in the picture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only for the calling of the convention, but the origin of the whole matter is in the States. Article V now reads that Congress—on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention.

The convention proceeds to discuss the matter submitted to it by the several States. The Congress has nothing to do with that discussion. The convention may sit in the city of Chicago or the city of St. Louis. No debate occurs in the Congress on the question. It is not before the Congress. The convention finishes its work and drafts an amendment to the Constitution to be submitted to the several States. My contention is that that convention should have the power to say what method of ratification should be followed in the States, and not the Congress, which has never had anything to do with it.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, that seems logical; and yet I am adhering to the idea that we ought to change this Constitution, if we do change it, only where the experience of the country has shown that change is absolutely necessary. The Senator knows that there is no difficulty growing out of the particular matter to which we refer. Congress has always exercised that power, and I know of no good reason why it should not continue to exercise that power. Personally, I believe it would be a mistake to change that provision, though I am not disposed to be contentious about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Neither am I.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I will not offer the amendment now, as I am advised that there is another amendment pending. At the proper time I shall offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending, namely, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from New York if an amendment to the substitute something like this would not meet, very largely, at any rate, the situation that he has in mind and has embodied in his amendment. I think the Senator is very strongly of the opinion that an amendment, when submitted by Congress, should be considered and acted upon in some way by the legislatures of the States; that that would aid the people in arriving at a correct conclusion. It occurred to me that that result would be brought about if we should amend the substitute as follows:

After the words "In either case" in line 1 of the original print reported by the committee—I have not the other correct copy—insert the words "shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States and." Then the substitute reads:

Shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of this Constitution, when ratified by a vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the several States—

Then, after the words "several States," insert "after action by their respective legislatures."

So that it would then read in this way:

Shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States, and shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of this Constitution, when ratified by a vote of the qualified electors in three-fourths of the several States after action by their respective legislatures, said election to be held—

And so forth.

The effect of that amendment would be that when Congress submits an amendment it would be referred to the legislatures of the different States, and they would pass upon it, whether favorably or unfavorably makes no difference; but after their action, whether favorable or unfavorable, the amendment would be submitted to the voters of the States, and, if they ratified it, then it would become a part of the Constitution regardless of what action the legislature took upon it. In other words, it would simply provide what, as I understand, the Senator has been urging very earnestly and very strongly—that the people should have the benefit of the discussion of the matter in the legislature.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Plus affirmative or negative action in the legislature.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They would have their opinion, then, on the amendment, but it would not be controlling.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In other words, they would have the judgment of the legislature, for instance, that the amendment should not be agreed to, but they would be left entirely free to overturn that judgment.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am ready to yield the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I just want to ask a question. Would the Senator from Washington make that a condition precedent, that the legislatures must first pass upon it before the people pass upon it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have required that first; yes—that it shall be submitted to the legislatures and be passed upon.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it must be passed upon by the people, no matter what action the legislature takes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BAYARD. In other words, the legislative action is not prohibitive in either case?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all; it is merely advisory.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is one matter of verbal construction on which I want to submit an observation or two.

In line 12, on page 2, the amendment reads:

Provided, That the members of at least one house in each of the legislatures which may ratify shall be elected after such amendments shall have been proposed.

The query that is in my mind is in reference to rejection; I am wondering if it might not be an improvement in that to say, instead of the word "ratify," "take action upon the amendment," or something of that kind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When that point is reached, if it is reached without further modification of the so-called Walsh amendment, I was going to propose to insert, after "ratify," the words "or reject." That point was raised the other day, and I see the strength of it. It should be made perfectly clear that they should take no action whatever unless one house has been elected subsequent to the submission.

Mr. ADAMS. In further reference to the amendment, I have this to submit:

I have followed the discussion of this matter as closely as I could, somewhat at variance from the general membership of the body. It is a matter of very great interest to me, and I think of very great importance. I was very much impressed with the premise which the Senator from New York laid for his argument. As I gathered, the basis of his conviction that the amendment should be adopted was certain things that had happened in connection with certain amendments. I do not mean, as was suggested in debate at one time, that he had objected to what had happened, but that as a result of proceedings in connection with the ratification of some of the amendments he had become convinced that the people as a whole were a safer repository of ultimate power than the legislature; that there was more danger of hasty and ill-considered action on the part of legislatures than on the part of the people.

I accept that. I think that is sound doctrine. I was a bit surprised to find what is rather the vindication of Jefferson coming out of the Hamiltonian headquarters. I say that not in a partisan sense, but with the utmost regard, because I am a great admirer of Hamilton. I am one of those who regard him as a man of great brilliancy and great patriotism. My reading of constitutional history always keeps in mind Hamilton's position at the close of the Constitutional Convention, when he said that, notwithstanding the fact that the Constitution as submitted was probably more remote from his own desires in the matter than those of any other man in the convention, he proposed to support it, and he was one of the three men who did the most to secure its ratification.

Then, I recall again his patriotic action in the Burr-Jefferson presidential election. I have those two things in my mind, and they always occur to me when I differ with Hamilton as to his principles; but I feel that the Senator from New York and those concurring with him have not followed their premise to a logical conclusion. I think it is true, both as a matter of practice and as a matter of theory, that the people are a wiser and a safer repository of ultimate authority for the revision of our constitutional provisions than legislatures. I think it has been demonstrated.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. In an investigation we had of this matter before the Judiciary Committee some startling facts were presented, so far as the ratification of constitutional amendments was concerned. It was shown that 3,700 people in the legislatures of the country have ratified the amendments that have been adopted, as against 110,000,000 people. I should like to put in the RECORD, with the Senator's permission, this table headed "At the mercy of the lobby—Number of legislative votes required to amend the United States Constitution."

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. This table gives the name of every State, with the number of members of the legislature of the house and members of the senate, and gives the total. It shows that in the whole country, counting every State, the number of members of the legislatures in both bodies, all told, is only 7,403, or, in other words, that less than 4,000 men can ratify amendments to the Constitution. That fact, together with the fact that every State in the Union submits amendments to its constitution to the people, is the reason why the Judiciary Committee reported this amendment providing that it should be left directly to the people, so as to have uniformity in the adoption of constitutional amendments.

I ask that this table be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That is, 673 State senators and 1,643 State representatives, or 2,316 legislators in all, can ratify a Federal amendment, with all members of 36 legislatures present and voting.

The figures for the remaining 12 States are shown in the following table:

The 2,316 legislators in 36 States who can amend the Federal Constitution amount to less than 32 per cent (31.5) of the total number of legislators, 7,403, in 48 States.

To block repeal of any amendment requires only 167 votes in the 18 State senates of Arizona, Delaware, Maine, Maryland, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, Vermont, West Virginia, and Wyoming. (See table above, senate majorities.)

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am thoroughly convinced that the people are safer and saner, less liable to ill-considered action, less subject, certainly, to pressure from organized minorities than legislatures. I have had that opinion for some years, and my brief experience here has not in any way weakened or varied that opinion—that is, that legislatures are subject to pressure from minorities, from organized propaganda, and that it is quite useless to endeavor to put that pressure on the people as a whole. The voters as a whole are not subject to pressure from minorities. They are almost brutal in their disregard of minorities with which they disagree. In the Constitutional Convention I think Elbridge Gerry was one of those who declined to support the Constitution as framed because he thought it was leading to what he thought was the greatest possible evil in government, which was too much democracy.

I think it has been demonstrated in the past few years, comparatively, that the people are the safest repository of ultimate authority; that those who are genuinely conservative—that is, those who want to conserve our institutions as democratic institutions for the benefit of the people as a whole—have been driven to abandon fear of the people generally. It seems to me that very wisely we are departing from the theory of our original Constitutional Convention, which was not to leave to the people any real, direct authority. We have broken away from it first, in providing the direct election of Senators. That is the first place where the people of the United States have been permitted to put their hands directly on real authority, with the single exception of the House of Representatives, so that Congress is now directly responsible to the public. We are now seeking, in the substitute, to place the power of constitutional amendment in the hands of what is the safer repository, and is not only safer but we all concede as a matter of right that that is where the right to determine the form of our government belongs.

Our whole political theory is based upon the fact that the people generally are the source of political power, and the only question is, How shall that power be applied? Here we have a proposed constitutional amendment submitted to the Congress, put through the careful scrutiny of committees, and then it receives the debate and the discussion of the deliberative assembly, and is then ready for submission to those who should have the power to approve or to reject. It seems to me that under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York we are not escaping the evil which he observes and of which he complains—that is, his amendment leaves in the hands of the legislatures the determination as to whether or not the people shall have any voice in the ratification of these amendments.

If you have a legislature of the kind that the Senator apprehends, where impulse and pressure will prevail, it will be just that legislature which will refuse to permit the people to vote in the matter. In other words, the very places where we are seeking to escape that danger will be the places where we will not escape it.

The Senator conceded the other day that he believed that ultimately all of the States would make a part of their permanent law provisions requiring submission to the people. It seems to me that that is the ultimate outcome. If it is the thing that is to come because it is the will generally both of legislatures and of the people, it seems to me that we should do that immediately, and have a standard and uniform method of consideration of constitutional amendments; not have in one State consideration by the legislatures, and in another State submission to the people.

I am also apprehensive on this ground: I concur with the Senator that we should not have constitutional amendments put through in haste, and without consideration. On the other hand, if we have a grave situation, where an amendment is required, we should be able to put an amendment through with as much expedition as is consistent with consideration, and I am apprehensive that the plan which the Senator from New York proposes will result in delay to an extent greater than is really justified by the situation. That is, it may involve the double process of legislative action as well as popular action, possibly, in every State. That is an ultimate possibility. So that it seems to me that upon the ground of sound principle, upon the very premise upon which the original constitutional amendment was founded, and to accomplish the purposes desired, the Walsh amendment is preferable.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have given notice of an amendment that I propose to offer providing that the election shall be held under such rules and regulations as the legislature shall require; so that, after all, it would be a matter of legislative requirement as to the time and the rules.

Mr. ADAMS. I believe the matter has been guarded with a good deal of care in that respect.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] suggested a thing which is very pertinent—that constitutional amendments should receive the utmost possible consideration, and he asked, will they receive greater consideration as a part of the election of a legislator who is to pass upon it, or upon submission to the people directly?

I am disposed to feel that the submission of an amendment directly to the voter, when he would vote "yes" or "no" upon the adoption of the particular amendment, would insure to that amendment greater consideration than if the voter merely considers in connection with the election of members of the legislature the question, "Shall I vote for this man because he is for or against this amendment?" where the choice of individual legislators is bound up with a multitude of other questions. I am disposed to think that if we can conceive of a public question involved in a constitutional amendment of very great public interest we might get back into our legislatures the thing we sought to get out when we voted for a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of Senators. One of the things which impressed me most in my desire for the direct election of Senators was the necessity of protecting the legislature of my State and the legislatures of other States from the influences which continually creep in for the purpose of controlling the election of Senators. If we have national questions involved in the election of the State legislators, we may again find the State legislature elected, not upon State issues, as it should be, but upon the basis of national issues, a thing which, I think, is undesirable. That is, I am among those who think the national party emblems do not help in the selection of city councilmen, for instance. I think the intrusion of national questions into city, county, and State elections frequently is detrimental to the results at the polls. So that I am disposed to answer the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania by saying that in my judgment the greater consideration will be given by the voter when the question is submitted to him as a separate and independent question.

We have in my own State the initiative provided by constitutional amendment. We have had the matter tested there. We have found our people reasonably careful in the exercise of that power. The weakness is this, that the initiation of measures submitted under the initiative comes from small groups, groups having no authority whatsoever. That is, one may sit down in his office and frame an amendment to the Constitution, or a law, and then, through the process of petition circulation, initiate it. We are providing here for the formulation of a carefully drawn amendment by a deliberative body elected by the people so that the weakness which exists in our initiative procedure does not exist in this case. But even in its operation our provision for the initiative has not operated badly.

One of the Senators on the floor called attention to what happened in Oregon, where two conflicting provisions were adopted. I would only suggest that if that Senator will examine the session laws of the various States and see what the legislatures have done, he will find that this record of the people of Oregon on this one question does not compare unfavorably with the general product of State legislatures, because we have had very, very remarkable productions from State legislatures, which has indicated that there is much careless and much hasty legislation.

So, following this debate, not having any preconceived ideas in reference to it, but largely basing my conclusion on the very premise of the gentleman who is fathering the original amendment, I have come to the conclusion that I should vote for the committee amendment.

WILLIAM B. BRADLEY.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, a short time ago I introduced a bill in the Senate, being Senate bill No. 383, relating to a small local matter which was passed and went to the House of Representatives. One of the Representatives from South Carolina in the House introduced a similar bill, being House bill 1316, which passed the House and has been sent to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims. I now desire to move to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of the House bill; and if that motion shall be adopted, I shall then ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] has been consulted and is perfectly willing that this action shall be taken. It will straighten out the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 1316) for the relief of William B. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that a request has been made to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily?

Mr. DIAL. No; I merely ask unanimous consent for the passage of the House bill. It will take only a moment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it shall not involve debate, I will not object.

Mr. DIAL. There will be no debate at all. Identical separate bills have been passed by each House. This will correct the matter, and one bill will stand passed by both Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 1316?

Mr. DIAL. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of that bill?

Mr. DIAL. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Committee on Claims being discharged from the further consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Claims is discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. DIAL. I now ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 1316.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1316) for the relief of William B. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina. It authorizes the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to credit the account of William B. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina, with the sum of $100, that amount now being charged against him for the loss of one special stamp book of the value of $100.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not intend longer to debate this question this evening. I regret that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has left the Chamber for the moment, but the Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is present, and I am wondering if he has any idea as to whether we may get a vote tomorrow?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not know what Senators wish to speak on the constitutional amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not desire a vote this afternoon, does he?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It so happens, I will say in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] left the Chamber on an important engagement, with the implied understanding that no important phase of the joint resolution would be voted on this afternoon; and there are other Senators in the same position.

Mr. OVERMAN. For that reason I will not consent that a vote be taken this afternoon, if I can prevent it.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest to the Senator that he ask that the joint resolution be temporarily laid aside, because the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has a bill he would like to have considered, and the Senator from Ohio also has a bill for which he would like consideration. Then we could take a recess until to-morrow, which would save the Senator two hours in the morning.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before I follow out the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, let me say, not by way of debate, that the Senator from Washington a little while ago made a very interesting and to me it seemed a very important suggestion in connection with the proposed constitutional amendment. I regret especially that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is not present. Perhaps he did not hear it at the time. I am not going to put a definite question to the Senator from Connecticut, who is the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or to any other Senator; but the Senator from Washington suggests that the Walsh amendment be amended in such form as to make the submission of an amendment to the legislature mandatory, and that the legislature shall act upon it, and thereafter there shall be a further submission to the people themselves, which shall be mandatory, and the people's decision shall be final and controlling.

Mr. OVERMAN. It seems to me that would meet both contentions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It rather appeals to me. It accomplishes the purpose desired by Senators who have been discussing this matter in a perfectly friendly manner from both sides of the question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, that is a new feature of it. The effect of that would be that the Constitution of the United States could not be amended without a two-thirds vote of both branches of Congress favorable to it, the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, and of the people.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; that is not the effect, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I do not understand it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], it makes no difference what the legislature does. It may vote for or against ratification. Whatever it does, under the Senator's suggestion, the proposal must then be put before the people mandatorily, and what they say controls and decides.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The legislature, then, is to serve the purpose of giving it publicity?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just so.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is it exactly. That meets both views.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they wanted it the people could have it, and if they did not want it the people could reject it, irrespective of the action of the legislature?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; just so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see no objection to that myself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Neither do I. I wanted to bring this matter to the attention of the few Senators who are here this evening before we recess or adjourn in order that they might think it over before we meet to-morrow.

I now ask that the unfinished business may be informally laid aside.

MAHONING RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee on Commerce and submit a report (No. 301) thereon. I also ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It is a bridge bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the report will be received. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Ohio reports back favorably, from the Committee on Commerce, House bill 6623, granting the consent of Congress to the Pittsburgh, Youngstown & Ashtabula Railway Co., its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Pittsburgh, Youngstown & Ashtabula Railway Co., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Haseltown, in the county of Mahoning, in the State of Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT GASOLINE TAX.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 655, Order of Business 282, to provide for a tax on motor-vehicle fuels sold within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as reported by the committee I am opposed to the passage of this bill, for several reasons.

While this is called a reciprocity bill, the real purpose of it is that the automobile owners of the District of Columbia shall be allowed to evade taxation. There is hardly a State in the Union where gasoline is not taxed. In nearly all of them it is taxed at 2 cents a gallon. In Virginia, just across the river, it is taxed at 3 cents a gallon. In Maryland, just across the District line, it is taxed at 2 cents a gallon. It is not taxed at all now in the District of Columbia; and at present the automobile owners of the District of Columbia have to pay a small license fee both to the District and to the State of Maryland, if they run their cars in the State of Maryland.

In the State of Tennessee, using it as an illustration, automobile owners pay a $15 license tax, which, I believe, is the highest tax which automobile owners in the District of Columbia pay for any car now. They pay a property tax of a little more than 3 per cent on a valuation quite as large as in the District, and in addition they pay a 2-cent tax on gasoline. Under these circumstances, the idea of Congress passing a bill to exempt from taxation the automobile owners of the District of Columbia is, in my judgment, absolutely indefensible.

I do not understand how any Senator, knowing that in his own State there is a license tax, there is a tax on gasoline, and there is a property tax on automobiles, can knowingly vote to exempt automobiles in the District of Columbia from a property tax altogether, and yet that is what this bill proposes to do.

In addition to that, the tax rate in the city of Washington is $1.20. In my city it is just a little more than 3 per cent. In nearly every other city of the Union it is about 3 per cent, State, county, and municipal tax. The tax rate here is very low. The assessment is very moderate. It is not based on a cash value, as we all know. To exempt the automobiles of the District from any property tax is something that is very unfair and unjust.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator has a substitute to offer for this measure which provides for the taxation to which he refers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to strike out the portion of it that exempts the District automobiles from a property tax.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. I understand that the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the committee, was opposed to this exemption from taxation, and has already made a report opposing the exemption from taxation, and I hope he will accept an amendment striking out the provision of the bill which does permit an exemption from the property tax.

I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just to make a short statement—

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BALL. The bill as originally reported provided for the 2-cent tax on gasoline and also the personal tax on automobiles. The one as reported now relieves the personal tax on machines, and 1 cent of the gasoline tax goes in lieu of that. I find that in many States when they put the 2-cent tax on gasoline they relieved the automobile personal tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. What States are they?

Mr. BALL. My own State did it. I made the statement before the general committee that there was no State that did that; but I find on examination that there are a number of States that have done it, so their contention in that respect is fair. I have agreed to report this bill, though, for this reason—

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there? Does not his own State provide a license tax?

Mr. BALL. My State provides a license tax. So does this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is only $1, which is a nominal tax. That is not a tax. That is a subterfuge.

Mr. BALL. Will the Senator permit me just to make one statement? Then I shall be through.

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. BALL. It makes very little difference how Congress levies the tax in the District of Columbia; an appropriation is made by Congress, and the District of Columbia raises 60 per cent of that appropriation. If the people here are not paying a sufficient rate, it is because Congress does not make sufficiently liberal appropriations for the District. They paid last year almost $2,000,000 more than Congress appropriated. That is the reason why the people of the District object to raising this additional $500,000 tax; but, as I say, Congress compels the District Commissioners to raise enough revenue to equal the 60-40 proposition, whatever appropriations Congress makes. As far as I can see, it makes very little difference whether we pass this bill with this tax or without this tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then suppose the Senator accepts my amendment?

Mr. BALL. I have no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator permit the committee amendments to be disposed of first?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. Let us pass on this, as we have it under consideration. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment may be passed upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me get the wording of this bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Where is the amendment? What page is it on?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am just hunting for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The top of page 3.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 3, I move to strike out, in line 4, the words "in lieu of the personal-property tax on motor vehicles."

Mr. BALL. That language is offered as a substitute—to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the words in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the way to get at it.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, lines 4 and 5, it is proposed to strike out "in lieu of the personal-property tax on motor vehicles."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let us dispose of this amendment as amended first.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I want to offer another amendment to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Oh! The Chair begs the Senator's pardon.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 3 the amendment provides that—

One half of such tax shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the entire credit of the District of Columbia, and the other half shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and to the credit of the District of Columbia in the same proportions as appropriations for the District of Columbia are paid from the Treasury of the United States and from the revenues of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year in which the tax is collected.

I move to strike out that language. This tax that is imposed on automobiles should, of course, go into the Treasury and be expended as other taxes are raised and expended in the District of Columbia. It is not at all fair to vote one half of it to the District absolutely and the other half to the District and the United States in the proportions of 40-60. I move to strike that out, and I hope the Senator will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, as amended.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order to make it complete, it will be necessary now to strike out the words "Except as provided in section 10," because all of that section has been stricken out by the Senate committee. That will all be stricken out.

Mr. COPELAND. How would it read then?

Mr. McKELLAR. It would read:

That a tax of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by an importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes shall be levied, collected, and paid in the manner hereinafter provided.

That is all there will be in it.

Mr. COPELAND. Then will the Senator cut out all the rest?

Mr. McKELLAR. All the rest of it has gone out on amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to, as follows:

On page 1, after line 2, strike out "That on and after the passage of this act a registration fee of 15 cents per horsepower for all motor vehicles registered, and a tax of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels sold, within the District of Columbia shall be levied and collected in the manner hereinafter provided, which tax shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia, to be available for appropriation and exclusively for road and street improvement and repair, without contribution by the United States to match such expenditure of the revenues derived from such tax; but no registration fee shall be charged for any motor vehicle bearing a registration marker or plate of any State which grants to the actual residents of the District of Columbia the privilege of using the roads of that State in return for a like privilege granted the actual residents of that State by the District of Columbia, and on and after the passage of this act no tax of any character or description, except as in this act provided, shall be levied or assessed upon any motor vehicle in the District of Columbia: Provided, That this act and any section thereof shall be inoperative and of no effect unless the State of Maryland shall agree to permit, on and after the passage of this act, the free and unrestricted use of the public highways of that State by motor vehicles bearing registration markers or plates of the District of Columbia in like manner and to the same extent as the free and unrestricted use of the public highways of the District of Columbia is extended to motor vehicles bearing registration markers or plates of the State of Maryland," and in lieu thereof insert "That a tax of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by an importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes shall be levied, collected, and paid in the manner hereinafter provided."

Mr. McKELLAR. There is an amendment on page 3, line 16, so as to make the paragraph read:

(a) The term "motor vehicle" means all vehicles propelled by internal-combustion engines, electricity, or steam, except traction engines, road rollers, and vehicles propelled only upon rails and tracks.

I ask the chairman of the committee why those exceptions are put in. If we are going to have a tax on gasoline, why make those exceptions?

Mr. BALL. Those exceptions are made in all the States. I do not know any special reason why there should be those exceptions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that all of lines 18 and 19 on page 3 be stricken out.

Mr. BRUCE. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee just how the amendments he has offered affect the relations between the District of Columbia and Maryland in this matter?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BRUCE. Then I ask the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BALL. These amendments, I think, will not affect reciprocity. They will not affect Maryland in any way.

Mr. BRUCE. That is what I thought.

Mr. BALL. The only provision Maryland desires to have made is the imposition of a 2-cent tax on gasoline.

The remaining amendments of the committee were, on page 3, line 12, after the word "That," to strike out "the following words, terms, and phrases are, for the purposes hereof, defined as follows, viz:

"(a) 'Motor vehicles' as used in this act shall be held and construed to mean and include," and to insert "as used in this act."

On page 3, line 16, before the word "all," to insert "(a) The term 'motor vehicle' means," so as to read:

(a) The term "motor vehicle" means all vehicles propelled by internal-combustion engines, electricity, or steam, except traction engines, road rollers, and vehicles propelled only upon rails and tracks.

On page 3, line 20, after "(b)," to strike out "Motor-vehicle fuels" as used in this act shall be held and construed to mean and include," and to insert "The term 'motor-vehicle fuels' means," so as to read:

(b) The term "motor-vehicle fuels" means gasoline and other volatile and inflammable liquid fuels produced or compounded for the purpose of operating or propelling internal-combustion engines.

On page 4, line 2, before the word "fuel," to strike out "liquid" and insert "motor-vehicle," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That kerosene shall not be considered to be a motor-vehicle fuel in the meaning of this act.

On page 4, line 3, after the word "term," to strike out "dealer" as used in this act shall be held and construed to mean and include any person, firm, or corporation who imports or causes to be imported for sale or disposition, or distribution for commercial purposes, or use in public vehicles, into the District of Columbia gasoline and other volatile and inflammable liquid fuels, produced or compounded for the purpose of operating and propelling motor vehicles as herein defined, and also any person, firm, or corporation who produces, refines, manufactures, or compounds such motor-vehicle fuels in the District of Columbia for use, distribution, or sale and delivery in the District of Columbia, and to insert: "Importer" means any person who brings into, or who produces, refines, manufactures, or compounds in, the District of Columbia motor-vehicle fuel to be sold or otherwise disposed of by him or to be used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes.

"(d) The term 'person' includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

"(e) The term 'commissioners' means the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

So as to read:

(c) The term "Importer" means any person who brings into, or who produces, refines, manufactures, or compounds in, the District of Columbia motor-vehicle fuel, etc.

On page 4, after line 22, to strike out:

Sec. 3. That on and after the passage of this act, each and every dealer, as defined in this act, who is now engaged or who may hereafter engage in his own name, or in the name of others, or in the name of his representatives or agents, in the District of Columbia, in the sale or use of motor-vehicle fuel, as herein defined, shall, not later than the last day of each calendar month, render to the assessor of the District of Columbia a statement of all motor-vehicle fuel sold, or disposed of as hereinbefore provided, by him or them in the District of Columbia during the preceding calendar month, and shall pay a tax of 2 cents per gallon to the collector of taxes on all motor-vehicle fuel as shown by such statement, in the manner and within the time hereinafter stipulated.

On page 5, line 12, to change the section number from "4" to "3"; in the same line after the word "That," to strike out "all dealers in motor-vehicle fuel in the District of Columbia," and to insert "each importer of motor-vehicle fuel"; in line 17, after the word "such," to strike out "dealer," and insert "importer"; in line 19, after the word "the," to strike out "firm," and to insert "association"; in line 23, after the word "No," to strike out "dealer as herein defined shall, on and after the passage of this act, sell, use, or distribute any motor-vehicle fuel," and to insert "importer shall sell or otherwise dispose of or use any motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia"; and on page 6, line 2, before the word "as," to strike out "furnished," and insert "filled"; so as to make the paragraph read:

Sec. 3. That each importer of motor-vehicle fuel shall file with the assessor of the District of Columbia a duly acknowledged certificate, on forms prescribed, prepared, and furnished by the said assessor, containing the name under which such importer is transacting business within the District of Columbia, the names and addresses of the several persons constituting the association or partnership, and, if a corporation, the corporate name under which it is authorized to transact business, and the names and addresses of its principal officers, resident general agent, and attorney in fact. No importer shall sell or otherwise dispose of or use any motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia until such certificate is filed as is required by this act.

On page 6, line 3, to change the section number from "5" to "4"; in the same line, after the word "That," to strike out "on and after the passage of this act, all dealers in motor-vehicle fuel" and to insert "each importer engaged in the District of Columbia in the sale or other disposition or use of motor-vehicle fuel"; in line 8, before the word "month," to insert "calendar"; in line 10, after the words "gallons of," to strike out "motor fuel sold, used, or disposed of by them as in this act provided," and to insert "motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by such importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes, and of the number of gallons of such fuel so sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from and resale without the District of Columbia"; in line 17, after the word "month," to strike out the comma and the word "which" and insert a period; in the same line, before the word "report," to insert "Such"; after line 21, strike out "firm or association, which report shall contain a statement of the quantities of motor-vehicle fuel so sold, used, or disposed of within the District of Columbia from his or their respective places of business. Bills shall be rendered to all purchasers of motor-vehicle fuel by dealers in motor-vehicle fuel as herein defined" and insert "partnership or association," so as to make the section read:

Sec. 4. That each importer engaged in the District of Columbia in the sale or other disposition or use of motor-vehicle fuel shall render to the assessor of the District of Columbia, on or before the last day of each calendar month, on forms prescribed, prepared, and furnished by the said assessor, a sworn report of the total number of gallons of motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by such importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes, and of the number of gallons of such fuel so sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from and resale without the District of Columbia, during the preceding calendar month. Such report shall be sworn to by one of the principal officers in case of a domestic corporation, by the resident general agent, or attorney in fact, or by a chief accountant or officer in case of a foreign corporation, or by the managing agent or owner in case of a partnership or association.

On page 7, after line 2, to insert "Sec. 5. That invoices shall be rendered by importers to all purchasers from them of motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia"; at the beginning of line 6, to strike out the word "bills" and insert "invoices"; in line 9, after the word "the," to strike out "dealer or dealers in question will pay said tax," and insert "importer has paid the tax or will pay it"; and in line 11, after the word "the," to strike out "following month" and insert "calendar month next succeeding the purchase," so as to read:

Sec. 5. That invoices shall be rendered by importers to all purchasers from them of motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia, except in cases of retail sales. Said invoices shall contain a statement, printed thereon in a conspicuous place, that the liability to the District of Columbia for the tax herein imposed has been assumed, and that the importer has paid the tax or will pay it on or before the last day of the calendar month next succeeding the purchase.

On page 7, line 14, after the word "or," to strike out "disposed of" and insert "otherwise disposed of"; in line 15, after the word "paid," to insert "by the importer"; in line 16, before the word "month," to insert "calendar"; in line 17, after the word "shall," to insert "issue a"; in line 18, after the words "receipt to the," to strike out "dealer therefor and cover same into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia in the manner provided by section 1 of this act; Provided, however, That the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia may retain in his hands, at all times, such sum not exceeding $1,000 as in the judgment of the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia shall be sufficient to enable him to pay promptly all claims for refunds," and to insert "Importer therefor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That the tax in respect to motor-vehicle fuel so sold or otherwise disposed of or used in any calendar month shall be paid by the importer on or before the last day of the next succeeding calendar month to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, who shall issue a receipt to the importer therefor.

On page 8, line 2, after the word "sales," to strike out "distribution, and use" and to insert "other dispositions, and uses"; in line 3, before the word "shall," to strike out "dealer" and insert "importer," and in line 8, after the word "Commissioners," to strike out "of the District of Columbia," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the records of all purchases, receipts, sales, other dispositions, and uses of motor-vehicle fuel of every importer shall, at all times during the business hours of the day, be subject to inspection by the assessor and the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, or by their duly authorized agents, or by any other agent duly authorized by the commissioners to make such inspection.

On page 8, line 9, after the word "person," to strike out the comma and the words "firm or corporation, or any dealer or distributor of motor-vehicle fuel to receive and accept any shipment from any dealer or to pay for the same, or to sell or offer for sale any motor-vehicle fuel," and to insert "to receive or accept from any importer, except in cases of retail sales, any motor-vehicle fuel"; in line 16, after the word "invoices," to strike out "of said shipment" and to insert "for the fuel"; beginning with line 17, to strike out "shipment originating and terminating within the District of Columbia" and to insert "such motor-vehicle fuel"; in line 19, after the word "person," to strike out the comma and the words "firm, or corporation, or any dealer or distributor, from any dealer, or is sold or offered for sale by him or them"; and, in line 22, after the word "person," to strike out the comma and the words "firm or corporation, or dealer or distributor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any person to receive or accept from any importer, except in cases of retail sales, any motor-vehicle fuel, unless the statement provided for in section 5 of this act appears upon the invoices for the fuel. If any such motor-vehicle fuel is received and accepted by any person upon the invoice of which said statement does not appear, such person shall pay to the collector of taxes the tax herein imposed or be liable to the District of Columbia for double the amount of the said tax, which amount may be recovered by civil suit or action in any court of competent jurisdiction.

On page 9, line 3, after the word "tax," to strike out "on motor-vehicle fuels exported or sold for exportation from the District of Columbia to any other jurisdiction or nation," and in line 5, after the word "imposed," to insert "on motor-vehicle fuels in the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from and resale without the District of Columbia," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That no tax shall be imposed on motor-vehicle fuels in the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from and resale without the District of Columbia.

On page 9, line 9, after the word "person," to strike out the comma and the words "firm, or corporation who shall buy or use any motor-vehicle fuel as defined in this act for the purpose of," and to insert "who purchases any motor-vehicle fuel in the District of Columbia to be used for"; in line 15, after the word "or," to strike out "who shall purchase or use any of such fuel"; in line 16, before the word "purpose," to insert "other"; in the same line, after the word "than," to insert "use"; in line 17, after the word "vehicle," to strike out "used or"; at the beginning of line 18 to strike out "used or"; in line 19, after the word "which," to strike out "motor" and insert "motor-vehicle"; in line 21, after the word "paid," to strike out "shall be reimbursed and repaid" and insert "shall be refunded"; in line 22, after the word "tax," to strike out "paid by him" and to insert "so paid by the importer"; in line 24, after the word "the," to strike out "original"; on page 10, line 5, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out the comma and the words "and the said collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, upon the presentation of such statement and such vouchers, shall cause to be repaid to such consumer from the taxes collected on motor-vehicle fuel the said taxes paid on motor-vehicle fuels purchased or used other than for motor vehicles, as aforesaid: Provided, That applications" and to insert "Such refunds shall be made by the collector of taxes from moneys paid him for taxes under this act and not covered into the Treasury. For the purpose of such refunds the collector of taxes is authorized to retain on hand at all times moneys from such taxes in an amount not in excess of $1,000. Applications"; in line 19, after the word "purchase," to strike out "or invoice"; in the same line before the word "That," to strike out the word "further," and in line 20, after the word "made," to strike out "such claimant" and insert "the applicant," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That any person who purchases any motor-vehicle fuel in the District of Columbia to be used for operating or propelling any stationary gas engine, tractor used for agricultural purposes, motor boat, aeroplane, or aircraft of any character, or for cleaning or dyeing, or for any other purpose other than use in a motor vehicle operated, or intended to be operated, in whole or in part, upon any of the public highways of the District of Columbia, on which motor-vehicle fuel the tax imposed by this act shall have been paid, shall be refunded the amount of such tax so paid by the importer, upon presenting to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a sworn statement accompanied by the invoices showing such purchase, which statement shall set forth the total amount of such motor-vehicle fuel so purchased and used by such consumer other than in motor vehicles operated, or intended to be operated, on any of the public highways of the District of Columbia. Such refunds shall be made by the collector of taxes from moneys paid him for taxes under this act and not covered into the Treasury. For the purpose of such refunds the collector of taxes is authorized to retain on hand at all times moneys from such taxes in an amount not in excess of $1,000. Applications for refunds, as provided herein, must be filed with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia within 30 days from the date of purchase: Provided, That before any refund shall be made the applicant shall furnish to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia satisfactory evidence by sworn statement of the exempted use of such fuel purchased by him.

On page 10, line 24, before the word "That," to insert "(a)"; in line 24, after the word "person," to strike out the comma and the words "association, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act, or any person, firm, or agent of any corporation, who shall make any false statement in connection with the sale or use of any motor-vehicle fuel intended to be used for any of the purposes described in this act" and to insert "violating any provision of sections 3 to 6, inclusive, or refusing or obstructing inspection under section 7, or falsely making any statement or report required by this act," so as to read:

SEC. 11. (a) That any person violating any provisions of sections 3 to 6, inclusive, or refusing or obstructing inspection under section 7, or falsely making any statement or report required by this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

On page 11, after line 10, to insert:

(b) Any person who fails to pay any tax upon motor-vehicle fuels imposed by this act shall be liable to the District of Columbia for a penalty equal to twice the amount of such tax. Such penalty may be collected in a civil suit in any court of competent jurisdiction.

On page 11, line 16, after the numerals "12," to strike out "That owners," and to insert "(a) That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a registration fee of $1 for each calendar year for each motor vehicle operated in the District of Columbia; except that for motor vehicles propelled by steam or electricity the fee shall be as provided in subdivision (b)," so as to read:

SEC. 12. (a) That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a registration fee of $1 for each calendar year for each motor vehicle operated in the District of Columbia; except that for motor vehicles propelled by steam or electricity the fee shall be as provided in subdivision (b).

On page 11, line 21, before the word "of," to insert "(b) Owners"; and in line 23, after the word "fees," to strike out "which shall include the registration fee referred to in section 1 of this act," so as to read:

(b) Owners of electrically driven and steam operated motor vehicles shall be charged the following annual registration fees:

On page 12, after line 6, to insert:

(c) The registration fee shall be paid to the collector of taxes. Upon the payment of any such registration fee there shall be issued for the motor vehicle two identification tags of such design and a registration certificate in such form as the commissioners may prescribe.

On page 12, after line 11, to insert:

(d) All registration fees collected during any fiscal year shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and to the credit of the District of Columbia in the same proportions as appropriations for the District of Columbia are paid from the Treasury of the United States and from the revenue of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year in which the fees are collected.

On page 12, line 21, after the word "registration," to strike out "markers or plates" and to insert "tags"; in line 22, after the word "and," to insert "the operator of any such motor vehicle shall be"; and in line 25, after the word "registration," to strike out "markers or plates" and to insert "tags and all registration certificates," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 13. That all motor vehicles owned and officially used by the United States or by the District of Columbia shall carry registration tags of the same character, and the operator of any such motor vehicle shall be subject to the same regulations and provisions as apply to all other motor vehicles operated within the District of Columbia, all such registration tags and all registration certificates to be furnished without charge.

On page 13, line 11, after the word "act," to insert "or regulations prescribed thereunder," and in line 14, after the word "assistants," to insert a semicolon and the words "and all suits for the collection of any tax or penalty under this act or such regulations shall be instituted by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That all prosecutions for violations of the provisions of this act or regulations prescribed thereunder may be in the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information filed by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants; and all suits for the collection of any tax or penalty under this act or such regulations shall be instituted by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants.

On page 13, after line 17, to strike out:

SEC. 16. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed to make refunds of registration fees paid under existing law on motor vehicles to the extent that the payments may be in conflict with the provisions of this act.

On page 13, line 23, to change the section number from "17" to "16"; and in the same line, after the word "That," to strike out "all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained" and to insert "nothing in this act"; and on page 14, line 2, before the words "of the," to insert "of section 7," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That nothing in this act shall be construed in any wise to affect the provisions of paragraphs 11, 13, and 14 of section 7 of the act of Congress relating to license taxes approved July 1, 1902.

On page 14, after line 3, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 17. (a) That the provisions of this act relating to the tax on motor-vehicle fuels shall take effect 30 days after the enactment of this act. The personal-property tax on motor vehicles provided in existing law shall not be in effect for any fiscal year ending June 30 and commencing while such tax on motor-vehicle fuels is in effect.

(b) The provisions of this act relating to the registration tax on motor vehicles shall take effect January 1, 1925; and the provisions of the twenty-ninth paragraph under the heading "Contingent and miscellaneous expenses" in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, except the third and fifth provisions thereof, are repealed.

(c) Any violation of any provisions of law or regulation issued thereunder which is repealed by this act, and any liability arising under such provisions or regulations, may, if the violation occurred or the liability arose prior to such repeal, be prosecuted or enforced to the same extent as if this act had not been enacted.

On page 14, after line 22, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 18. That the commissioners may make such regulations as in their judgment are necessary for the administration of this act and may affix thereto such fines and penalties as in their judgment are necessary to enforce such regulations (in cases in which a penalty is not otherwise provided by law).

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That a tax of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by an importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes shall be levied, collected, and paid in the manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That as used in this act—

(a) The term "motor vehicle" means all vehicles propelled by internal-combustion engines, electricity, or steam, except traction engines, road rollers, and vehicles propelled only upon rails and tracks.

(b) The term "motor-vehicle fuels" means gasoline and other volatile and inflammable liquid fuels produced or compounded for the purpose of operating or propelling internal-combustion engines: Pro- vided, That kerosene shall not be considered to be a motor-vehicle fuel in the meaning of this act.

(c) The term "importer" means any person who brings into, or who produces, refines, manufactures, or compounds in, the District of Columbia motor-vehicle fuel to be sold or otherwise disposed of by him or to be used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes.

(d) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

(e) The term "commissioners" means the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That each importer of motor-vehicle fuel shall file with the assessor of the District of Columbia a duly acknowledged certificate, on forms prescribed, prepared, and furnished by the said assessor, containing the name under which such importer is transacting business within the District of Columbia, the names and addresses of the several persons constituting the association or partnership, and, if a corporation, the corporate name under which it is authorized to transact business, and the names and addresses of its principal officers, resident general agent, and attorney in fact. No importer shall sell or otherwise dispose of or use any motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia until such certificate is filed as is required by this act.

SEC. 4. That each importer engaged in the District of Columbia in the sale or other disposition or use of motor-vehicle fuel shall render to the assessor of the District of Columbia, on or before the last day of each calendar month, on forms prescribed, prepared, and furnished by the said assessor, a sworn report of the total number of gallons of motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by such importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes, and of the number of gallons of such fuel so sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from the resale without the District of Columbia, during the preceding calendar month. Such report shall be sworn to by one of the principal officers in case of a domestic corporation, by the resident general agent, or attorney in fact, or by a chief accountant or officer in case of a foreign corporation, or by the managing agent or owner in case of a partnership or association.

SEC. 5. That invoices shall be rendered by importers to all purchasers from them of motor-vehicle fuel within the District of Columbia, except in cases of retail sales. Said invoices shall contain a statement, printed thereon in a conspicuous place, that the liability to the District of Columbia for the tax herein imposed, has been assumed, and that the importer has paid the tax or will pay it on or before the last day of the calendar month next succeeding the purchase.

SEC. 6. That the tax in respect to motor-vehicle fuel so sold or otherwise disposed of or used in any calendar month shall be paid by the importer on or before the last day of the next succeeding calendar month to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, who shall issue a receipt to the importer therefor.

SEC. 7. That the records of all purchases, receipts, sales, other dispositions, and uses of motor-vehicle fuel of every importer shall, at all times during the business hours of the day, be subject to inspection by the assessor and the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, or by their duly authorized agents, or by any other agent duly authorized by the commissioners to make such inspection.

SEC. 8. That it shall be unlawful for any person to receive or accept from any importer, except in cases of retail sales, any motor-vehicle fuel unless the statement provided for in section 5 of this act appears upon the invoices for the fuel. If any such motor-vehicle fuel is received and accepted by any person upon the invoice of which said statement does not appear, such person shall pay to the collector of taxes the tax herein imposed or be liable to the District of Columbia for double the amount of the said tax, which amount may be recovered by civil suit or action in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 9. That no tax on motor-vehicle fuels exported or sold for exportation from the District of Columbia to any other jurisdiction of nation shall be imposed.

SEC. 10. That any person who purchases any motor-vehicle fuel in the District of Columbia to be used for operating or propelling any stationary gas engine, tractor used for agricultural purposes, motor boat, airplane, or aircraft of any character, or for cleaning or dyeing, or for any other purpose other than use in a motor vehicle operated or intended to be operated in whole or in part upon any of the public highways of the District of Columbia, on which motor-vehicle fuel the tax imposed by this act shall have been paid, shall be refunded the amount of such tax so paid by the importer, upon presenting to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia a sworn statement accompanied by the invoices showing such purchase, which statement shall set forth the total amount of such motor-vehicle fuel so purchased and used by such consumer other than in motor vehicles operated or intended to be operated on any of the public highways of the District of Columbia. Such refunds shall be made by the collector of taxes from moneys paid him for taxes under this act and not covered into the Treasury. For the purpose of such refunds the collector of taxes is authorized to retain on hand at all times moneys from such taxes in an amount not in excess of $1,000. Applications for refunds, as provided herein, must be filed with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia within 30 days from the date of purchase: Provided, That before any refund shall be made the applicant shall furnish to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia satisfactory evidence by sworn statement of the exempted use of such fuel purchased by him.

SEC. 11. (a) That any person violating any provision of sections 3 to 6, inclusive, or refusing or obstructing inspection under section 7, or falsely making any statement or report required by this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(b) Any person who fails to pay any tax upon motor-vehicle fuels imposed by this act shall be liable to the District of Columbia for a penalty equal to twice the amount of such tax. Such penalty may be collected in a civil suit in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 12. (a) That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a registration fee of $1 for each calendar year for each motor vehicle operated in the District of Columbia; except that for motor vehicles propelled by steam or electricity the fee shall be as provided in subdivision (b).

(b) Owners of electrically driven and steam operated motor vehicles shall be charged the following annual registration fees:

All motor vehicles operated by steam, $15 per annum.

Electrically driven passenger-carrying vehicles, $11 per annum.

Electrically operated trucks, having 1,000 pounds or less rated carrying capacity, a minimum charge of $20 per annum, plus $2 for each additional 1,000 pounds or less rated carrying capacity.

(c) The registration fee shall be paid to the collector of taxes. Upon the payment of any such registration fee there shall be issued for the motor vehicle two identification tags of such design and a registration certificate in such form as the commissioners may prescribe.

(d) All registration fees collected during any fiscal year shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and to the credit of the District of Columbia in the same proportions as appropriations for the District of Columbia are paid from the Treasury of the United States and from the revenues of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year in which the fees are collected.

SEC. 13. That all motor vehicles owned and officially used by the United States or by the District of Columbia shall carry registration tags of the same character, and the operator of any such motor vehicle shall be subject to the same regulations and provisions as apply to all other motor vehicles operated within the District of Columbia, all such registration tags and all registration certificates to be furnished without charge.

SEC. 14. That when under authority of law gasoline or other motor-vehicle fuel is sold by an agency of the United States within the District of Columbia, for use in privately owned vehicles, such agency of the United States shall, by agreement with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, arrange for the collection of the tax of 2 cents per gallon herein authorized to be imposed, and for accounting to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia for the proceeds of such tax collections.

SEC. 15. That all prosecutions for violations of the provisions of this act or regulations prescribed thereunder may be in the police court of the District of Columbia, upon information filed by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia or any of his assistants; and all suits for the collection of any tax or penalty under this act or such regulations shall be instituted by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants.

SEC. 16. That nothing in this act shall be construed in any wise to affect the provisions of paragraphs 11, 13, and 14 of section 7 of the act of Congress relating to license taxes, approved July 1, 1902.

SEC. 17. (a) That the provisions of this act relating to the tax on motor-vehicle fuels shall take effect 30 days after the enactment of this act. The personal property tax on motor vehicles provided in existing law shall not be in effect for any fiscal year ending June 30 and commencing while such tax on motor-vehicle fuels is in effect.

(b) The provisions of this act relating to the registration tax on motor vehicles shall take effect January 1, 1925; and the provisions of the twenty-ninth paragraph under the heading "Contingent and Miscellaneous Expenses" in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, except the third and fifth provisions thereof, are repealed.

(c) Any violation of any provision of law or regulation issued thereunder which is repealed by this act, and any liability arising under such provisions or regulations may, if the violation occurred or the liability arose prior to such repeal, be prosecuted or enforced to the same extent as if this act had not been enacted.

SEC. 18. That the commissioners may make such regulations as in their judgment are necessary for the administration of this act and may affix thereto such fines and penalties as in their judgment are necessary to enforce such regulations (in cases in which a penalty is not otherwise provided by law).

Mr. McKELLAR. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to section 9, on page 9, which reads:

That no tax shall be imposed on motor-vehicle fuels in the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of for exportation from and resale without the District of Columbia.

It seems to me that sort of a provision arranges for two prices of fuel oils in the District of Columbia, and there is no reason for it. I wonder if the chairman would be willing to accept an amendment to strike that out?

Mr. BALL. Should any gas be sold for distribution in another State, they would have to pay the additional 2 or 3 cents in the State in which they sold it to the distributor. This provides only for the gas which is sold to be distributed in another State or sold in another State.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield, it must have had some other purpose, because the bill as it came from the House, as the Senator will see if he reads the language, provided for what the Senator says, and that was intended, I take it, from the House language. That language was stricken out. If the purpose is what the Senator has said, that there should be no tax on motor-vehicle fuels exported or sold for exportation from the District of Columbia or in any other jurisdiction of the Nation—and that is all the Senator mentions—then, there was no reason for striking that language out of the House text and putting this language in, which I think would be very confusing, and would allow some company to sell to people in Maryland and Virginia at one price and to the people of Washington at another price.

Mr. BALL. There was but the one reason for changing that. The legislative draftsmen thought the original language of the bill as it came from the House was very confusing, and thought the language as amended could not be misconstrued.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not feel that I am able to construe the language.

Mr. BALL. I am willing to accept the original language.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the remaining committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Turning back to page 2, I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the only part of the committee amendment now left is these words:

That a tax of 2 cents per gallon on all motor-vehicle fuels within the District of Columbia sold or otherwise disposed of by an importer or used by him in a motor vehicle operated for hire or for commercial purposes shall be levied, collected, and paid in the manner hereinafter provided.

The words "manner hereinafter provided" have been stricken out, and I suggest to the Senator that the entire amendment be stricken out and that the language adopted by the House be adopted in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair suggest to both the Senator from Tennessee and the chairman of the committee that there is a manner hereinafter provided for the levying, collecting, and paying of these taxes, with a lot of details as to how they are to be paid and when?

Mr. BALL. I am sure the Senator from Tennessee will not wish to have that clause stricken out if he will read it carefully. The part stricken out is that commencing with the language "Except as provided in section 10," as to whether that should be paid to the credit of the District or whether it should be paid partly to the credit of the District and partly to the credit of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. That has been stricken out?

Mr. BALL. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Chair is right in what he has said. As a part of my remarks I ask that there be incorporated in the Record a short extract from the minority report of the House committee on the bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to, submitted to the House by Mr. BLANTON, was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Every man, woman, and child in the United States is vitally affected by this proposed legislation in that it puts upon their shoulders the burden of paying a still larger proportion of the local taxes of the 487,000 people living in the District of Columbia.

Until recently this bill was generally understood to be a reciprocity measure, designed to bring about harmony between Maryland and the District of Columbia, so as to abolish the necessity of motor-vehicle owners living within the District of Columbia procuring licenses and number tags from Maryland, and vice versa. Now, in the bill and report it is titled "tax on motor-vehicle fuels."

There is but one proper title for this measure, and that is: "The District Commissioners' latest tax-dodging scheme."

During 1923 there were 110,973 motor-vehicle licenses and number tags issued by the District of Columbia. For same the following charge was made: Ten dollars for over 30 horsepower, which embraced Rolls-Royce, Pierce Arrow, Lincoln, Packard, Cadillac, Marmon, Peerless, Locomobile, Stutz, Studebaker, and other cars of similar makes; $5 for all cars between 24 and 30 horsepower; and $3 for all cars not over 24 horsepower, embracing Fords.

In addition there is a property tax of $1.20 per $100 on the value of the car, which on a $15,000 Rolls-Royce amounts to $180.

Under present law the 437,000 people living in the District of Columbia, many of whom have no connection whatever with the Government, are allowed a personal property exemption (motor vehicles not included) of $1,000, exempt from taxation, and pay a total tax only $1.20 per $100 on real and personal property, and a tax of only five-tenths of 1 per cent on intangibles. All of the balance of the expenses of this big city is paid by the whole people of the United States under what is known as the present 60-40 system of charging 60 per cent of the appropriations embraced in the District of Columbia appropriation bill to the District of Columbia and 40 per cent of same to the Government (but prior to the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, the ratio was 50-50, the Government paying half of all such appropriations), and the additional system of carrying large appropriations for civic projects purely local in character, in Government department appropriation bills, chargeable wholly to the Government. In other words, in every other city of any size in the United States the people are paying taxes running from $2.75 to $6 per $100, and in addition to their own taxes are paying a large proportion of the taxes that should be paid by the people of Washington by letting the 437,000 people living in the District of Columbia pay a total tax on real and personal property of only $1.20 per $100, with an exemption from tax on $1,000 personal property.

This bill (H. R. 655) was framed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who claim that if it is passed the Governor of Maryland will grant reciprocity to the District of Columbia, whose motorists will not then be required to get license tags in Maryland.

But the terms of this bill are quite different from the demands made by Maryland. All that the Governor of Maryland required was a tax of 2 cents per gallon on gasoline, as his State assessed such a tax, and he didn't want people to have an advantage of buying gasoline cheaper in the District than in Maryland.

Under present law certain receipts collected by the District of Columbia are placed in the Treasury, 60 per cent to the credit of the District and 40 per cent to the credit of the Government, to accord with the 60-40 ratio respecting appropriations.

But in framing their so-called reciprocity measure the District Commissioners did not stop with fixing a 2-cent tax on gasoline, which was all that Maryland demanded, but they seek to change the law in the following vital particulars, to wit: (1) They abolish the $10 and $5 and $3 charges for licenses and provide that all cars—Rolls-Royce and Fords alike—are to be charged a license fee of only $1 each, which entitles them to number tags; (2) they abolish all of the property tax, which even at the small rate of $1.20 per $100 paid in the District, amounted to $180 per annum on a $15,000 Rolls-Royce; and (3) they provide that instead of placing the receipts from the 2 cents per gallon tax on gasoline in the Treasury 60 per cent to the credit of the District and 40 per cent to the credit of the Government, 80 per cent would be placed to the District and only 20 per cent to the Government, thus changing the present 60-40 ratio, respecting disbursements, to a ratio of 80-20, respecting receipts, with the Government, as usual, getting the little end of it.

The committee has amended the bill by exempting all motor vehicles up to the value of $1,000 from a property tax, but providing that the present property tax of $1.20 per $100 shall apply above the valuation of $1,000. The committee admits that this will exempt at least five-sixths of all the automobiles in the District of Columbia from the payment of any property tax whatever, for at least five-sixths of such automobiles would be assessed at a valuation of not more than $1,000, which is the value the committee exempts from all taxation.

Illustrating how discriminating this bill is, say Smith and Brown each have $2,000. Smith invests his $2,000 in a residence, which impairs in no way the city streets or roads, requires no traffic cops, occupies no rights of way, and imposes no hazard or danger to the public, yet upon his $2,000 residence he pays his $1.20 per $100 tax, or a tax of $24. While Brown, who runs an automobile for hire invests his money, $1,000, in an automobile and $1,000 in household furniture. His $1,000 furniture will be exempt from all taxes. And his $1,000 automobile will be exempt from all taxes, except he will pay the measly little sum of $1 for his license, inasmuch as the 2-cent gasoline tax will be no more than all other citizens of other States pay, in addition to their heavy license tax, State property tax, and municipal property tax; and Brown will be operating his automobile day and night upon the streets and boulevards, wearing out the surface, menacing the safety of the public, occupying his right of way, and receiving the benefit of traffic cops to guide and protect him. Such discrimination is manifestly unjust.

Every State in the United States other than Maryland has reciprocity with the District of Columbia. Out of the United States Treasury by direct appropriation Maryland has had more public money spent upon her State highways than practically all other States combined. And in addition Maryland has received her fair share of the good-roads appropriations made by Congress, the Bureau of Public Roads advising that Maryland has already received from it alone the sum of $4,013,004.99. And in addition thereto Congress has already appropriated an additional $75,000,000, out of which Maryland will receive approximately $640,000 more.

And until this year Maryland and Virginia had approximately 2,500 children attending the public schools of Washington, receiving free their tuition and schoolbooks, paid for by the District of Columbia and the Government. These 2,500 children are still attending Washington's schools, but this year are charged a small tuition.

Yet Maryland has refused to permit any automobile bearing a District of Columbia license to even pass from the Nation's Capital along any of her roads without paying for a Maryland license.

Let me illustrate just how difficult it is to procure a Maryland license. Our colleague from Louisiana, Mr. ASWELL, testified before the committee that on the appointed day he took his place in the long single-file line, and after working his way toward the office for three long hours, the office closed for that day. He went back the second day and took his place in the long line already formed. There was a little frail woman just ahead of him. It took them three and one-half hours to get to the office, where only one at a time was admitted. Mr. ASWELL heard the pompous official ask the little frail woman a question, which she was slow in answering, saw this official hand her a card, and say in a most abrupt manner: "Take this card and get out of here and don't come back until you learn the regulations." Mr. ASWELL described this office as a dingy, dirty, disreputable sort of a place presided over by insolent officials. He finally procured a card similar to the one handed the woman, which was a blank to be filled out by him answering numerous questions by way of examination. He was compelled to fill in this blank on the outside, and was compelled to take his place in line on two succeeding days, waiting approximately three hours each time before he finally secured his Maryland license tag. Thus to get his Maryland license permitting him to drive from his Nation's Capital through any part of Maryland he was compelled to stand in line over 12½ hours and lose the best part of four days.

Learning that he could ship his Ford car to Texas much cheaper by boat from New York our colleague, Mr. MANSFIELD, had his son drive his Ford from Washington to New York for shipment; but he had to pass through a part of Maryland. He was promptly arrested, detained over night, fined nearly $30, was put to expense incident to the delay, and caused to miss his boat. On the return trip, knowing that he couldn't pass through Maryland, and to avoid the red tape and annoying delay of trying to procure a Maryland license, he paid $40 extra freight to ship his Ford from New York to Washington.

In their letter of December 3, 1923, which the District Commissioners wrote to our committee chairman, when they transmitted this bill for immediate passage, they assign reciprocity with Maryland as its great emergency purpose. Yet it is titled "A bill to provide for a tax on motor-vehicle fuels, and for other purposes." The "other purposes" constitute its real design. No clause in the bill even mentions reciprocity. No part of the bill authorizes reciprocity. The bill nowhere compels reciprocity. Should we pass this bill, Maryland still could compel all cars from the District of Columbia to procure Maryland licenses.

The State of Virginia, surrounding the District on the other side, has a tax on gasoline of 3 cents per gallon. With equal propriety, the next day after passing this bill, Virginia could demand that Congress pass a new law increasing the tax on gasoline to 3 cents per gallon, so that the people would not all buy their gasoline in the District and in Maryland, only a few miles removed. The people of the United States do not expect Congress to thus specially legislate at the command of any State.

The people of the United States are entitled to have Maryland grant to the Nation's Capital the same automobile reciprocity which all of the States grant both to the District of Columbia and to Maryland, or else they are entitled to have Maryland account for the $4,013,004.99 which she has already received from the United States Treasury through the Federal Bureau of Public Roads and to have stopped the payment of the $640,000 more which Maryland will receive from such bureau during the coming fiscal year.

After the first section of this bill shall have been read, I intend to offer as a substitute for the measure an amendment to the Federal highway act, proposed by our colleague, Mr. ASWELL, which, if passed, will force Maryland to grant reciprocity, same being the following:

"That section 21 of the Federal highway act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"No sums shall be apportioned or reapportioned under this act to any State which does not recognize the motor-vehicle identification tags or licenses issued by any other State or by the District of Columbia."

The above was introduced in the House by Mr. ASWELL as H. R. 32 on December 5, 1923, and has been pending ever since.

The committee report is misleading in stating that all States within 100 miles of the District of Columbia have adopted this method, viz, of making the registration license tag fee only $1 for all cars, exempting at least five-sixths of all the automobiles from a property tax and depending upon the tax on gasoline for raising the revenue.

Maryland is on one side of the District of Columbia and Virginia is on the other side. These two States surround it.

In the State of Maryland, under its present 1924 law, motor vehicles have to pay besides the 2 cents per gallon tax on gasoline a property tax to the State of $2.70 per $100 on the valuation of the car, and in addition have to pay for their registration and license tags a tax of 32 cents per horsepower on all cars.

In the State of Virginia motor vehicles, for instance, in the city of Alexandria, only a short distance away from Washington, have to pay a State license tax of 60 cents per horsepower, which averages about $15 per car, and a State property tax of $1.50 on the $100, full value of the car, and in addition have to pay a municipal license tax, averaging about $4 per car, and also a municipal property tax, averaging about $7.50 per car, and then in addition to all of the above have to pay a gasoline tax of 3 cents per gallon.

Yet our District Commissioners' bill, sought to let all cars, Rolls Royces, Pierce Arrows, Lincolns, on down, escape all taxation by merely paying a registration fee of $1 each and a gasoline tax of 2 cents on a gallon, and our committee is attempting to allow five-sixths of all the automobiles in the District of Columbia escape all taxation by paying this $1 and the 2-cent gasoline tax.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE OLD NATIONAL BANK OF MARTINSBURG, W. VA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 214) for the relief of The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, Martinsburg, W. Va., which were, on page 1, to strike out all after "hereby," in line 3 down to and including "destroyed" in line 14, and to insert "authorized and directed to redeem in favor of The Old National Bank of Martinsburg, Martinsburg, W. Va., United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness Nos. 4980, 4981, 4982, and 4983, each in the denomination of $500, and Nos. 8175 and 8176, each in the denomination of $1,000, series TM 2-1921, dated July 15, 1920, and matured March 15, 1921, with interest from the date of issuance to the date of maturity, at the rate of 5½ per cent per annum, without presentation of the said certificates of indebtedness, which have been lost, stolen, or destroyed"; and on page 2, lines 7 and 8, to strike out "of the United States of America" and to insert "and the interest, which had accrued when the principal became due and payable."

Mr. CAPPER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

COAST GUARD INCREASE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 307, the bill (H. R. 6815) to authorize a temporary increase of the Coast Guard for law enforcement.

I desire to say that this is a bill making a temporary addition to the Coast Guard. It passed the House. Then the Senate on last Friday put a similar provision on the deficiency appropriation bill. The Commerce Committee in the Senate reported the House bill to the Senate at the same time. There is quite an opposition in both bodies of Congress to putting legislation upon appropriation bills. While the provision was put on an appropriation bill in the Senate, if we should pass House bill 6815 as the House passed it, that would take it out of conference on the deficiency appropriation bill and would relieve both Houses of Congress and both committees from the embarrassment of putting legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand this is the very legislation that we put on the deficiency appropriation bill we just passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; it is.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BRUCE. Does it not provide for an appropriation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senate passed it as a provision on the deficiency bill last Friday. I shall be glad to talk the matter over with the Senator, because I do not believe the Senator would object if he understood the situation. This is substantially the same language that was put on the deficiency appropriation bill passed last Friday, and therefore it has passed really both Houses; so I thought there would be no objection to putting it through in a legislative way.

Mr. BRUCE. I should like to have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should be glad if the Senator would do so. I trust the Senator will look at it between now and to-morrow and possibly we can act on it to-morrow.

Mr. BRUCE. I shall endeavor to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the present consideration of the bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 25, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 24, 1924.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Irwin B. Laughlin to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Greece.

POSTMASTERS.

IOWA.

George W. Goss, Blairstown.
Orlo L. Creswell, Kenwood Park.
George R. Hughes, Shellrock.
Wynema Bower, State Center.
Thompson C. Moffit, Tipton.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Sherwood B. Balliet, Coplay.
William D. Hellig, Stroudsburg.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 24, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, Thou art a God who giveth to all men liberally and Thy gracious promise is, as thy days so shall thy strength be! We praise Thee and give Thee offerings of our most thankful hearts. Hear, then, in love, O Lord, as we come to Thee for wisdom and guidance. May every affection, every sympathy, every act of the will be raised and strengthened by the inspiration of Thy holy presence. We bless Thee that we are the creatures of Thy redeeming love. We have received it through the pain, the sorrow, the death, and the spiritual conquest of the Teacher of men and the Savior of human destiny. O God of our fathers, we thank Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 22, 1924, was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. TREADWAY. The question of privilege is one affecting the rights of the House in its safety, dignity, and integrity, under Rule IX.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that is not privileged, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how a point of order could hold until the Chair knows what the question of privilege is. The Chair does not know what it is.

Mr. BLANTON. I presumed the gentleman would state his question of privilege.

Mr. TREADWAY. I rise under Rule IX, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Affecting the privileges of the House?

Mr. TREADWAY. Affecting the privileges of the House.

The SPEAKER. In order to do that the gentleman must present a resolution.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not seen the communication to which the gentleman refers, but the Chair knows its purport. It has been told to the Chair, and the Chair would personally feel much obliged if the gentleman would not present this.

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize the attitude of the Speaker, and at the same time I do not feel that the membership of the House should yield to his personal wishes. It affects the dignity of the House rather than the individuality of the Speaker, and I claim the right to present the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman can not make a point of order on something he does not know anything about.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the membership of the House, as well as the gentleman and the Speaker, have a right to know what the gentleman is basing the privilege upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has requested the gentleman to withdraw his question of privilege. The gentleman refuses and the Chair lays the resolution before the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. I regret I can not accept the Speaker's request.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the language published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Saturday, March 22, 1924, in the first column of page 4708 in the report of an address to the Senate by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is improper, unparliamentary, and a reflection upon the dignity of the House and its procedure, and constitutes a breach of privilege and is calculated to create unfriendly relations and conditions between the House of Representatives and the Senate.

And resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Senate and that the Senate be required to take appropriate action concerning the subject.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that a quorum is not present. It is evident there is not a quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll; and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich	Garner	McNulty	Schneider
Anderson	Gifford	McSwain	Sears, Fla.
Bloom	Gilbert	Madden	Shreve
Britten	Graham, Pa.	Merritt	Smithwick
Carew	Green, Iowa	Michaelson	Strong, Pa.
Christopherson	Hammer	Miller, Ill.	Sullivan
Clarke, N. Y.	Holaday	Mills	Swoope
Cole, Ohio	Hooker	Morris	Taylor, Colo.
Connolly, Pa.	Howard, Okla.	Nolan	Taylor, Tenn.
Corning	Johnson, Ky.	O'Brien	Tinkham
Crowther	Johnson, S. Dak.	O'Connell, N. Y.	Vare
Denison	Kahn	Oldfield	Vestal
Dickinson, Mo.	Kelly	Peavey	Ward, N. Y.
Domineck	Knutson	Phillips	Weller
Doughton	Langley	Prall	Welsh
Doyle	Lee, Ga.	Quayle	Werts
Drewry	Lineberger	Ransley	Williams, Ill.
Edmonds	Luce	Reed, N. Y.	Zihlman
Fredericks	Lyon	Reed, W. Va.
Frothingham	McClintic	Reid, Ill.
Gallivan	McFadden	Sanders, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the item to which I refer, appearing in the address of the Senator from Arkansas, reads as follows:

I think the New York Times is without justification in its criticism of the Speaker of the House on his violating the proprieties and the rules of the body over which he presides, because I never knew that anyone thought that the Speaker understood or had any regard for the rules of the body over which he presides. He never has given any evidence that he knew what the rules were or that he had any respect for them.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that this remark was made on the floor of the United States Senate, to which body all respect and parliamentary courtesy must be shown. It, nevertheless, is a reflection on the membership of this House and should not, in my opinion, be allowed to pass unnoticed from this floor. [Applause.] Any Member of Congress who has served with or under Speaker GILLET knows that he is a man of the very highest integrity, than whom no one has a higher regard for the dignity of this House, and is certainly thoroughly familiar with the rules of this body, which he interprets with absolute fairness and impartiality. [Applause.]

I maintain that the sentences to which I have referred are, in the phrase of Rule IX, a reflection upon the safety, dignity, and integrity of this body.

There is absolute precedent for the resolution which I have introduced. It is phrased in accordance with a resolution adopted by this House in the Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, page 5563, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the resolution to which I refer was adopted by a vote of 181 to 3, showing that the House appreciated the maintenance of its dignity when a Member was criticized on the floor of another body.

It seems to me the case in point is more flagrant than any to which precedents can be brought, in view of the fact that it reflects upon the Presiding Officer of this body; and if, in the language of the gentleman from Arkansas, he did not know the rules, the House membership should have taken cognizance of that fact long since. I maintain that he does know the rules, that he acts under them and interprets them impartially to both sides of this body. [Applause.]

I, however, find myself in an extremely embarrassing position. I read an account of that speech in the newspaper yesterday morning, and as soon as a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was available I was extremely provoked that such a reflection should be made. This morning I consulted two of my colleagues in whose judgment I have the very highest regard. Both of them felt as I do about following this matter up with this resolution, and so I introduced the resolution, absolutely without the knowledge of the Speaker or any of his close associates or the Committee on Rules. I introduced the resolution entirely upon my own responsibility, asking that the House defend its dignity here. I now find myself embarrassed by the Speaker's personal request. As a Member of the delegation from Massachusetts representing a district adjoining that of the Speaker, being very closely associated with him at home as well as I hope here, I can do nothing else than yield to the request of the Speaker made since I introduced the resolution—as the Members on the floor heard him ask me not to present it before being read by the Clerk. In view of that circumstance, the personal request he has made to me that I shall not pursue the matter further, out of regard for him and our personal association, I feel constrained to withdraw the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to have unanimous consent, and the resolution is withdrawn.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I should not be candid with the House if I did not say that I regret that the gentleman from Massachusetts saw fit to take the action he has taken this morning. My sole purpose in taking the floor is to direct attention to the spirit of the rule which the House has against referring to Members of the other body or mentioning the other body. Whatever may be the technical language of the rule—it is the intention to avoid friction based solely on personalities that might affect the orderly processes of legislation and destroy amicable relations between the two Houses. I am sure that my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, realized when he read the speech of the Speaker, Mr. GILLET, criticizing the Senate, that however fair might be the rulings of the Speaker who presides over this body, however delightful may be his personality, and however strong his character, I am sure the gentleman will concede that the Speaker of this body got off his accustomed poise and violated the spirit of the rule, and had every reason to know that that violation by him would provoke reply to it on the floor of the United States Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am not willing for the occasion to pass without adding this, that if you will lay aside partisanship there is not a man here who will search his conscience and who is familiar with the spirit of the rule but that will say that the speech of the distinguished Speaker of this House, occupying the position that he does in public life, in attacking the motives and conduct of the Members of the United States Senate was a greater breach of the spirit of the rule of this House than was the reply by a Member of that body to the speech by the Speaker outside of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. With the permission of the gentleman I suggest that he ought to know there is not anything in the rules of the House or the rules of the Senate which forbids a Member of either body in a public address, outside of the Senate or the House, making any statement he desires. The rule applies only to actions in the two bodies, in a representative capacity.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, my friend begs the question. The spirit of the rule is to maintain amicable relations between the two bodies, and no man who is of the high character and standing in the Nation that goes with the Speakership of this body can take advantage of the technical provisions of the rule and attack the Senate of the United States without knowing that he will provoke a violation of that rule by a Member of that body. To say otherwise would be to impeach the intelligence of the Speaker, and I impeach neither his intelligence nor his character. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair requests the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] to take the chair for a moment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea that anything of this sort was coming up this morning. The action of my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, was utterly unsuspected by me, and at my request he has withdrawn the resolution. Personally I do not care about such a resolution, and if there has been a violation of the rules of the Senate in its conduct toward the House, and if the House should feel it its duty to take action to maintain its dignity I do not think the initiative should be taken by a Member of the House from my own State, or by a particular friend of mine. I should prefer any action taken should be so initiated that there could be no suspicion of personal or partisan relationship.

Just a word in respect to the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I had no idea that what I said in the address which I made would excite so much attention. I think if all that I said—if my whole address had been seen by Members of Congress, the reaction would have been different. But I do not at all agree with the argument made by the gentleman from Arkansas. I do not think I have violated either a rule of the House or the spirit of any rule in saying what I did about the conduct of the Senate. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] has pointed out, our rules, of course, apply to our conduct here on the floor of the House, and nowhere else. We are all free to state what we please in respect to the Senate if it be not done on the floor of the House in our representative capacity. When speaking on the floor of the House I have always been most scrupulous not to violate that rule which forbids any reflection on the Senate, but outside of the House I think all of us can say what we please, so long as it is the truth. [Applause.] And I venture to say that every Member on the Democratic side, that the gentleman from Arkansas himself, in the last presidential campaign constantly made attacks upon the Senate.

I venture to say they all criticized the conduct of the United States Senate in its action on the treaty of peace, and I suspect they went much further than I did, and that they criticized individual Senators and referred to them by name. We are all free outside of this House. Here on the floor we are not; we must recognize the limitations which the rules prescribe.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. I state to the gentleman that I think he will find that whatever may have been my political zeal in the last campaign, never, even in a partisan debate, have I attacked the personal integrity of a Member of the Senate or questioned the honesty of his motives in any vote or position that he took on the floor of that body.

Mr. GILLETT. And neither did I.

Mr. WINGO. But the gentleman says that I attacked them.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly, the gentleman must have.

Mr. WINGO. I never denounced the United States Senate as a school for scandal or said that they were trying to besmirch people's reputations. I simply do not want the gentleman from Massachusetts to be laboring under a misapprehension as to my conduct.

Mr. GILLETT. I am not, but I have no doubt that the gentleman attacked the action of the United States Senate.

Mr. WINGO. I questioned the policy of that body, but did not question the individual motives.

Mr. GILLETT. That is what I mean.

Mr. WINGO. And I never attributed corrupt motives to any of them.

Mr. GILLETT. Nor have I.

Mr. WINGO. Or improper motives. I never accused Members of the United States Senate of being actuated by a desire to besmirch somebody's reputation.

Mr. GILLETT. I made no accusations as to motives. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to state to the gentleman, as a Democrat from Massachusetts, that I am heartily in accord with his views, and I am firmly convinced he should have his right to free speech when not presiding over this House. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT resumed the chair as Speaker.

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am just wondering if the Washington Post editorial has precipitated all of this impetuosity.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to submit a question to the Speaker about this rule. As I understand the operation of the rule, we are forbidden to criticize Members of the Senate on the floor of this House. The Senate is likewise prohibited from criticizing our action here. I want to know if it is the understanding of the rule that a Member of the House or a Member of the Senate has the right to go to the country and attack Members of the other body in any manner he sees fit, and that then the Members of the body attacked are forbidden to answer the attack or reply to the criticism on the floor of the body attacked?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair thinks, no matter what a person says outside, a person attacked has a right outside to say what he pleases and has a right also on the floor of the House to answer any argument or attack, provided he does not violate the rule as to personalities. As to them the Chair thinks the rules apply, no matter what the provocation may be. However, this is a moot question which the Chair does not think he ought to rule on until a specific issue arises.

Mr. RANKIN. With deference to the Chair, I think it is a very pertinent question, touching the issue now before the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 7449) making appropriation to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2650. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2656. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near and above the city of New Orleans, La.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order to-day, which is District of Columbia business, shall be in order on next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the business in order to-day may be in order next Monday. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I object. Reserving the right to object, I would like to say to the gentleman from Ohio that next Monday is unanimous-consent day—

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Oh, it is not. Well, then, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO THE ARMY AIR SERVICE, NAVAL BUREAU OF AERONAUTICS, AND THE MAIL AIR SERVICE.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 192.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 192.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of the House a select committee of seven Members for the Sixty-eighth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized, and directed to inquire into the operations of the United States Army Air Service, United States Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, the United States Mail Air Service, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either; said inquiry shall include investigation of contracts, settlements, or audits thereof, letters, expenditures, reports, receipts, or other documents in any way connected with any or all transactions of the said United States Army Air Service, the United States Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, the United States Mail Air Service, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either, and any corporations, firms, or individuals or agencies having any transactions with or being in any manner associated with or controlled or regulated by the said Air Service.

For the purpose of said inquiry, the committee, or any subcommittee designated by it, shall have the power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, affirmations, to take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and may hold its sessions at such places as the committee may determine.

Such committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the result of its inquiry, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

The Speaker is hereby empowered to issue subpoenas to witnesses upon the request of the chairman of said committee at any time, including any recess of the House, during the inquiry of the committee; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpoenas and other processes transferred to him by the said committee.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted this is a good resolution because of the character of the Member who introduced it, but what it is I do not know—

The SPEAKER. It is going to be discussed now.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I have not heard a word of it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is presented to the House, and if adopted, it provides for an investigation by a special committee, to be appointed by the Speaker, of the United States Army Air Service, the Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, and the mail air service. We appreciate the fact that the Air Service of the United States has been investigated several times. It is not the intent or purpose of the proponents of this legislation that they are going to uncover much scandal or any crookedness, but it is their desire to do something that will have real value to the Air Service of this country and present some constructive suggestions for its future conduct.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman give way—

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I would like to ask the gentleman, so as to obviate the possibility of the offering of an amendment to this resolution, which, I understand, will be entirely acceptable to the gentleman from Wisconsin who originally suggested this, whether, in the judgment of the gentleman, the scope of this resolution is broad enough to authorize an inquiry into the whole subject of air defense of the United States?

Mr. SNELL. It is the intent of the proponents of the resolution, as expressed before our committee, that they should get some constructive proposition before the Air Service of this country. We appreciate that we are spending a whole lot of money in this arm of defense, and we hope to bring something out from this investigation that will be of definite benefit to that service.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I am entirely satisfied, Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman's construction of the resolution, and I think that the scope of the inquiry should be broad enough to include that very important subject, so we may get some constructive legislation from the investigation.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it contemplated that this investigation shall go back and take cognizance of the operations in this regard during the war or be restricted to the period subsequent to the termination of the war?

Mr. SNELL. Well, there is no definite limit, so far as I know, on the investigation, but whatever investigation is held will go far enough, we hope, to produce some definite results.

Mr. LANHAM. Has there not been already a pretty thorough congressional investigation covering the period of the war?

Mr. SNELL. There have been several investigations, and I understand that these investigating committees have made some definite recommendations, and they want to see if these recommendations are being carried out at the present time. I understand some of the practices which the former investigation severely condemned are being carried on at the present time and—

Mr. LANHAM. Then are we to understand that the investigation subsequent to the war period is simply to be in the direction of these recommendations to see if the same evils exist to-day?

Mr. SNELL. I could not say definitely it is all subsequent to the war period; but it is to be a constructive investigation.

Mr. LANHAM. It appears to me there is a possibility of an unnecessary duplication of work if we are to go back into the investigations made covering the period of the war.

Mr. SNELL. I think there is a possibility; but I hope the good judgment of the men on the committee will see that is not the case, unless they discover some definite reason for doing so.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will yield for another question, is it the purpose of the Committee on Rules in recommending the passage of this resolution that the members of this special committee shall be selected from the House in general or from the membership of any particular committee?

Mr. SNELL. As far as the Committee on Rules is concerned, they have been interested only in the adoption of the special committee proposition, and it is up to the Speaker to appoint whoever he sees fit.

Mr. LANHAM. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the fact that there has been heretofore an investigation into the operation of the Air Service during the war, that some of the members of the former investigating committee should certainly be appointed upon this committee in order that some Members who have a familiarity with this investigation should serve in this capacity?

Mr. SNELL. That may be a constructive suggestion, but that has nothing to do with the appointment here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand the gentleman's purpose, as indicated by the reply he made to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT], is to go beyond the past conduct and submit constructive suggestions for the development of the Air Service of the Government?

Mr. SNELL. Yes. That is what the proponents of this resolution had in mind.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I noticed the subject of the inquiry includes looking into the contracts and audits and receipts. Should not the resolution provide for the operation and conduct of the respective branches of the Air Service of the country?

Mr. SNELL. It is intended to cover all those things in connection with the Air Service.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman think we should amend the resolution in that particular?

Mr. SNELL. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. What particular thing, may I ask, has precipitated this resolution?

Mr. SNELL. Statements, definite statements, to the effect that practices that were severely condemned by prior investigating committees are still being carried on at the present time. That is one of the particular things.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Did it relate to the criticisms of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]?

Mr. SNELL. He is one of the proponents of the resolution.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I was interested to know what the attitude of the Committee on Rules was when the request for an investigation was made. Of course, the committee allows the Member who seeks the investigation to make allegations with respect to the conditions in the particular department that he thinks requires investigation. Does the Committee on Rules, before it reports out a resolution of inquiry like the present one, confine itself to the finding of probable causes on these allegations, or does it accept the fact that allegations have been made, unsupported, as the basis of the inquiry?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is partly right and partly wrong. I will say to the gentleman that we had the head of the aircraft service, General Patrick, before us, and he explained the conditions. So far as I am concerned, the explanation was proper and satisfactory and right, but all the members of the committee did not agree with me, and he himself thought that an investigation would be proper and had no objections to it.

Mr. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think that in these days, when investigations are rampant, the Committee on Rules should not report out rules for investigations unless something was found prima facie justifying the report.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would not ordinarily make this suggestion to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], but I should think that a committee of seven was a sufficiently large committee. In this case, however, in view of the fact that there are a number of men familiar with the subject, and in view of the fact that a number of gentlemen have spoken to me about the advisability of slightly increasing the size of the committee, I would like now to ask the gentleman from New York if he would have any objection to amending his resolution so as to provide for a committee of nine, instead of seven?

Mr. SNELL. I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that personally I think a committee of five is better than a committee of seven; but the Committee on Rules did not agree with me on that proposition, and between seven and nine I do not think there is any great difference. If there is a real desire on the part of the House to increase that from seven to nine I shall not personally make an objection, although I have not been authorized by the committee to do that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would not oppose such an amendment if offered by myself or some other gentleman?

Mr. SNELL. I would have no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, while I have the very highest regard for the Committee on Rules and the members of the committee, I have not had it pointed out to me that there is any reason for the investigation at all. We have had investigations until we are all neglecting the work of Congress in our efforts to chase rainbows. We have had one investigation of the Aircraft Bureau conducted by a very able committee. It seems to me it is perfectly absurd for this House to keep on starting out "smelling" committees all over the country that are of no value except to produce newspaper notoriety.

Mr. SNELL. I think the gentleman is about 90 per cent correct, and to a large degree expresses my sentiments. But we were in a position where we could not very well refuse to grant this investigation, provided the House approves this resolution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from New York, who is always looking out for economy in the Government, knows that every other country in the world has had this same sort of a situation, where aircraft is carried on under different branches of the government service, and an inquiry into the whole subject was necessary in order to bring the governmental activities with respect to aircraft in relation to the navigation of the air up to date.

Mr. SNYDER. We have regular committees in this House whose duty it is to look after the Air Service in the different branches of the Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Other countries have had that same problem before them, and the question here is whether the different branches of this service should be combined or whether they should be kept separate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we ought to get something constructive out of any investigation that is to take place, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any objection to enlarging the scope of this investigation to find out what proper place the Air Service has in the national defense.

Mr. SNELL. It is the intention of the committee to let the investigation go forward and report back to the House with the hope of getting results.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman think this investigating committee will have authority under any of these resolutions to find out whether it is practicable or not to join these services of the Army and Navy without adding to the cost to the Government? Is this resolution broad enough to cover that?

Mr. SNELL. They can make recommendations back to the House as to what they think ought to be done. There is no limitation as to their recommendations.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman frankly states that in presenting his resolution his committee does not expect to uncover anything. If we are going to appoint that kind of a committee in that kind of a way, what is the use of spending this money?

Mr. SNELL. I did not say exactly that. I said that was not the only purpose of it.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. SNELL. I did not mean it that way, and the gentleman knows it.

I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, if I remember correctly, during the last two years of Woodrow Wilson's administration a Republican Congress created more than 80 investigating committees. It became my duty to represent the minority of the Committee on Rules when those investigations were proposed, and on every occasion, whenever an investigation was proposed, I said, by authority of the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules, "If there is anything rotten we want to uncover it as well as you do, and if there is any rascality being practiced we want the rascal uncovered just as much as you do." We reiterate that position here to-day. We do not care how far back you go with your resolution. If you take in the whole Democratic administration we have no fear that you will be able to find any wrongdoing on the part of any high official of the Democratic administration. I am sorry you can not say as much for your party since you have come into power. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Did the gentleman read Congressman BRITEN's interview in the Washington Post this morning to the effect that the reputation of America was very low in Cuba because of the revelations as to the crimes of the present Republican administration?

Mr. BARKLEY. He might have added the Philippines, too, in view of many damaging disclosures.

Mr. POU. That is not a surprising statement at all. The Democratic membership in this House is ready and willing at all times to cooperate with the majority in uncovering anything that ought to be uncovered. We say, so far as this resolution is concerned, that if there is any lead that this eighty-ninth smelling committee—I think it is No. 89—erected by the Republican membership of this House can uncover we are just as anxious for you to expose wrongdoing as you are yourselves, but I can not help reminding the majority that you utterly failed to connect the Wilson administration with any wrongdoing whatsoever. Not millions but billions of dollars of the people's money were appropriated and expended by the Wilson administration at a time when money could not be cautiously expended, because we wanted to win the war and win it quickly and thereby save American lives.

When peace was declared and you put your smelling committees in motion—more than 80 of them—not one single member of the Democratic administration could be held up to public condemnation.

This is a remarkable record, particularly remarkable when one considers the large number of crooks who descended upon Washington as soon as a new administration came in. Recent disclosures have shaken the confidence of the people in their Government. The Democratic minority will not attempt to prevent the passage of this resolution. We have not attempted to prevent the passage of any of these so-called investigating resolutions presented while our party had the Presidency. We wanted wrongdoing, if any there was, exposed then. We want any wrongdoing which may exist now exposed, no matter who the guilty person may be. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio in order that he may offer an amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment: Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SANDERS of Indiana). The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "nine."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were—ayes 160, noes 0.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF PREPARATION, DISTRIBUTION, ETC., OF GOVERNMENT BONDS AND OTHER SECURITIES.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 231.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the preparation, distribution, sale, payment, retirement, surrender, cancellation, and destruction of Government bonds and other securities. Said committee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess thereof and to hold its sessions in such places as the committee may determine; to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to administer oaths, and to take testimony. The Speaker is authorized to issue subpoenas to witnesses upon the request of the committee, and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all such subpoenas and other processes.

Resolved further, That said committee shall report to the House as promptly as possible the results of its inquiries, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution explains itself. It provides for the appointment of a special committee of five to investigate the preparation, distribution, sale, payment, retirement, surrender, cancellation, and destruction of Government bonds and other securities.

There have been several reports going about the country that there is a large duplication in Government securities, securities which were put out during the war. The evidence which came before the Committee on Rules was quite positive in several specific respects. I went to the Treasury Department and talked with Secretary Mellon relative to this proposition. In all fairness to the Secretary, it should be said, of course, that these matters took place before he became Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary says they have spent a great deal of time in checking over these various securities, and that, outside of a few small bonds that they knew were stolen but which have been accounted for, he does not believe there is any very great amount of duplication in these securities. Furthermore, he does not think any securities have gotten out which have not been paid for by the people who bought them, and that the Treasury itself has had full and complete payment for all the bonds that are in the hands of the public. But, notwithstanding that fact, he thought that perhaps, on account of these reports that were going about the country, we should have a small select committee of Congress go into the matter, clean it up, and tell the whole story, so that the public would know the true condition, and then the public would be satisfied with the simple statement from the Treasury Department.

For that reason we have brought in this proposition at this time. But it is fair to state to the House that when you pass a resolution of this kind, of course, you are interfering with the everyday work of the Treasury Department, and it will cost a good deal in extra help for additional employees to make the check-up that will be required in an investigation of this kind, and while, perhaps, as far as the House is concerned, it will not cost very much money, it will certainly cost the Treasury Department considerable money before it is all completed, to say nothing about the delay in current work.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not want to interfere at all, but the gentleman told us what evidence he got from the Secretary of the Treasury. Will the gentleman also tell us what evidence he got from others who came before the committee?

Mr. SNELL. There was a gentleman who came before the committee with copies of bonds that a man like myself or any inexperienced man would say were duplicates in a good many cases, and the evidence was quite effective that was produced before the committee, and while common laymen would think there was duplication that needed attention and explanation, still the Treasury Department say they have a full and complete explanation of it all. Nevertheless we felt that the statements were so direct that there was a reasonable excuse for the investigation.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. WATKINS. This resolution does not take into contemplation the discharge and the reinstatement of 28 employees of that bureau?

Mr. SNELL. Only incidentally, but that will probably be considered in connection with the investigation.

Mr. WATKINS. Do you not think that the committee ought to be given full power to investigate that matter in view of the fact it may dovetail into this investigation.

Mr. SNELL. I think that will be considered along with the other, although the only request to us was to investigate the duplication, sale, cancellation, and so forth, of bonds, and we have provided for that in this resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In view of the fact that what the gentleman is saying might be used as a guide in their work by the committee that will be appointed, I feel it is proper to say in regard to the observation made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WATKINS] that if the discharge of those employees does in any way dovetail into this transaction and has a connection with it, in my opinion, it comes within the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. I meant to convey the idea that, incidentally, that was true, or where it had any direct connection with the other, but that that was not the primary purpose of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman, as I understood, said that there was evidence before his committee which to a common man might indicate the duplication of bonds, but to the Treasury Department would not.

Mr. SNELL. No; I did not quite say that.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman ought to revise his remarks, because that would indicate that all men are common, except those in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SNELL. I said the Treasury Department had a full and complete explanation for that apparent duplication.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Rhode Island. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNELL of Rhode Island. I understood the gentleman to say that this investigation probably would not cost this body very much, but that it would cost the Treasury Department considerable money by reason of the extra number of employees who would be required to check up this data. Does the gentleman contemplate that the checking up in this investigation is to be done by the employees of the very department that is to be investigated and not by special employees engaged by this committee?

Mr. SNELL. I did not mean that at all, but necessarily they will have to do a good deal of the work under the supervision of the committee—done by the department itself.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In view of the fact that the gentleman has said that perhaps the matter of the discharge of some 30 employees nearly two years ago may be incidentally involved in the work of this committee, may I not say, just for the purpose of directing the committee's attention to an essential feature of that transaction, that if it goes into the transaction it ought to ascertain exactly under what circumstances the order of March 31, two years ago, was issued by the President.

Mr. SNELL. There are no limitations on the work of the committee, as far as it pertains to the main subject under investigation.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I hope there will not be. I would like to know the facts as to that matter.

Mr. SNELL. The committee will be authorized to make a full investigation.

Mr. LEA of California. Was there any evidence presented to the committee to show that the Treasury had actually been injured financially in these transactions?

Mr. SNELL. I definitely stated that Secretary of the Treasury Mellon did not think the Treasury had been hurt financially in the transactions.

Mr. LEA of California. Did those who demanded these investigations claim there was any such evidence?

Mr. SNELL. I could not state exactly in regard to that, but I think they inferred that it had.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield me two or three minutes?

Mr. SNELL. I yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I simply desire to say that there seems to have been criticism on the majority side with reference to the appointment of these investigating committees during the present session of Congress. I think it only fair to say that so far as I remember there have been only four special committees authorized by the House at this session of Congress; the Shipping Board investigation, which was introduced by a Democrat, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]; a special committee for the investigation of charges against two Members of Congress, which was demanded as a matter of right on that side of the House; an investigation authorized a few moments ago of the aircraft situation, which was originated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON], a distinguished Republican; and the pending resolution on which we are now about to vote, which has as its author the distinguished Representative from Illinois [Mr. KING], also a Republican Member of the House. So that as far as the record goes, about 75 per cent of the suspicion with reference to the efficiency of administration under the present régime has originated on that side of the House.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield for a short question.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield for the purpose of my offering an amendment?

Mr. SNELL. No; not at this time. I move the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

BELIEF OF DISTRESSED AND STARVING WOMEN AND CHILDREN OF GERMANY.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution. The Clerk reported the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 232.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 180) entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and some member of the Foreign Affairs Committee opposed to this resolution, the resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the resolution for amendment the committee shall arise and report the resolution to the House, with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that even under a resolution that comes from the Rules Committee the opposition should have a right to be heard. The time here is fixed, with one hour only of debate, as I understand it, half to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] and half to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], both of whom are for this rule. These two gentlemen are both in favor of the legislation to follow.

The SPEAKER. The Rules Committee has the right to make any report it pleases.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; unfortunately, that is true. But those against the rule ought to have a chance to be heard, especially on so important a matter as making a gift of $10,000,000 to Germany.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has one hour, and he can dispose of the time as he sees fit. If the gentleman from Texas does not think that the House has used him fairly, the gentleman has his remedy.

Mr. BLANTON. The only thing that remedy provides is to vote down the previous question, which is almost impossible to do, but I think those against the resolution ought to have a chance to be heard against it, and the Rules Committee should always so provide in order to be fair.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this appropriation of $10,000,000, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the doors were closed; and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to bring in absent Members.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Aldrich	Prothingham	McClintic	Schneider
Anderson	Gallivan	McFadden	Smithwick
Beedy	Garber	McKenzie	Strong, Pa.
Bloom	Garner, Tex.	McNulty	Sullivan
Brand, Ga.	Gifford	Martin	Swoope
Britten	Gilbert	Merritt	Taylor, Colo.
Chidbloom	Graham, Pa.	Michelson	Taylor, Tenn.
Christopherson	Hammer	Miller, Ill.	Temple
Clark, Fla.	Hayden	Morehead	Tinkham
Cole, Ohio	Hickey	Morris	Vare
Connolly, Pa.	Holaday	Newton, Minn.	Vestal
Crisp	Howard, Okla.	Nolan	Ward, N. Y.
Crowther	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oldfield	Wason
Curry	Kahn	Peavey	Weller
Dempsey	Kelly	Phillips	Welsh
Dominick	Kindred	Porter	Wertz
Doughton	Knutson	Quayle	Williams, Ill.
Doyle	Langley	Ransley	Winslow
Drewry	Lee, Ga.	Reed, N. Y.	Winter
Edmonds	Lineberger	Reed, W. Va.	Wright
Fenn	Loe	Reld, Ill.	Yates
Fredericks	Lyon	Sanders, N. Y.	Zihman

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEHLBACH). Three hundred and forty-three Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask if it is possible to agree on a limitation of debate on the rule. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that we have one hour, to be equally divided, for discussion of the rule, and at the end of that hour the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. That will be entirely agreeable to me. I want to say that we had already decided on 15 minutes for those in favor and 15 for those opposed on this side.

Mr. SCOTT. Under my request the gentleman from New York will have control of his own time. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the rule be confined to one hour, to be equally divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and myself, and at the end of the hour the previous question be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the debate on the resolution be concluded in one hour, one-half to be controlled by him and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], and at the end of the hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question. Is the gentleman in favor of the rule?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And also of the resolution?

Mr. SCOTT. I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. So will the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is rather an unfair request. There are men here who honestly, sincerely, and conscientiously oppose both the rule and the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. I think if the gentleman will wait he will find that those opposed to the resolution will get their share of the time.

Mr. BLANTON. It looks rather unfair on the face of it.

Mr. SCOTT. The rule provides that one-half of the time shall be controlled by proponents of the bill and one-half by opponents. If the gentleman can suggest a more equitable distribution of time, I would be glad to have him do so.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Will the gentleman yield? My recollection is that we had 10 hours in general debate on a three hundred million proposition, and the most of the speeches were not on the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I will say that all this debate must be confined to the resolution, for it is so provided in the rule.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will there be opportunity to amend this resolution and for debate under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to myself. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in behalf of the committee I present this rule authorizing the immediate consideration of House Resolution 180. The resolution to which I have just referred provides for an expenditure of $10,000,000 to purchase food and cereals in the United States for shipment to Germany. The subject matter of this resolution was fully considered by your Committee on Foreign Affairs in extended public hearings and the resolution was reported favorably to the House. The testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs came almost entirely from our embassy in Germany, the State Department, and American citizens. This testimony, undisputed, showed that at the present moment there are approximately 2,000,000 women and children in Germany who are starving and unless relief is offered within the next 30 days a large proportion of that number must necessarily perish. The Committee on Foreign Affairs came before the Committee on Rules asking for a rule permitting immediate consideration of House Resolution 180 insisting that although such resolution had been reported favorably by the committee it could not be reached under the present call of the calendar before the latter part of April and such delay would virtually defeat the object and purpose of such resolution. In other words they urged to your Committee on Rules that if the Congress wished to render this humanitarian aid it should be given immediately. Your Committee on Rules concurred in the opinion entertained and expressed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and we have therefore submitted this special rule for the immediate consideration of such resolution.

In the brief time at my disposal it is obviously impossible to discuss the merits of the resolution in justification or support of the rule. That will occur if the House shall accept the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Rules as to the urgent necessity of the immediate consideration of this resolution. However, I do wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this terrible distress has elicited the assistance of Great Britain, France, Italy, Austria, and even Russia. Allies and erstwhile enemies, to the extent of their respective abilities, have joined in an effort to aid this suffering humanity.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 30 seconds remaining.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KEARNS. The resolution recites that this relief is for the women and children of Germany. Are any of the men hungry over there?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Why was not that put in the resolution?

Mr. SCOTT. Because the committee felt the United States could not carry the entire burden and the immediate urgency was in behalf of the women and children. I am sure the gentleman will agree that the women and children should have our first consideration.

Mr. KEARNS. Is any of this money to be used for the purpose of feeding of men?

Mr. SCOTT. No. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this rule gives a legislative right of way for making a gift of $10,000,000 for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany. This relief is to be made up of grains, fats, milk, and other foodstuffs. I am for the rule and for the relief. I urged both before the steering committee and I spoke and voted for them as a member of the Committee on Rules.

I am for the relief, because it appeals to my mind as exceedingly reasonable. We are not taking a step in the dark. We have an abundance of light on this subject. We have the reports of our diplomatic and consular officers in Germany, the testimony of American citizens who have visited that country, and the evidence of our colleagues in Congress who have been eye witnesses of the present affliction of this now stricken but uncomplaining people.

To my mind two things stand out distinctly—Germany's present need of relief and America's present ability to meet that relief.

With reference to conditions in that country I have time to touch upon only a few figures and facts, leaving it to others to complete the picture presented to us. But these facts are sufficient to move any normal mind to serious thought. So vividly have I been stirred that it seems to me now that I can see in this land of war-oppressed people 20,000,000 actually starving; thousands of children in the densely populated industrial cities standing daily in line for hours waiting for their turn to buy the allotted pound of potatoes upon which life depends; other children filling hospitals so enfeebled from hunger that the emaciated skin folds loosely over youthful bones like cloth; children of 12 look like children of only 5 years. In Berlin we are told 50 per cent of the children are tubercular for want of nourishment.

So many pictures of suffering have been called to our attention that I seem to see German mothers staggering under ordinary burdens, falling down faint from hunger; mothers without swaddling clothes in which to wrap new-born babes save newspapers. No wonder each week there are 75 suicides in Berlin.

Before the discussion on this resolution is completed, I am sure these pictures will be made real to you, as they have been to me. Truly Germany's need is great, and we are told that by the latter part of this month or the first of the next this great need will reach its highest point of distress, despair, and death.

That the United States has the foodstuffs, grain, fats, and milk, and the means with which to afford this relief requires no argument.

While there is some financial distress among us, especially among the farmers in the Northwest, there is everywhere an abundance of food; indeed, the complaint of the farmer is that his crops are so plentiful and the prices so low as to make it unprofitable for him to pay the cost of bringing them to market. Surely we do not suffer want. We are not starving; we are not dying from hunger. Compared with the other nations of the world, we are enjoying to-day marvelous prosperity.

What more evidence do we need of our means than the Navy appropriation bill just passed, carrying $300,000,000? This is double the amount carried before the war, and for the destructive object of preparedness for more war and misery. The Army bill coming up Monday next will carry $250,000,000, more than doubled by the war—all for destructive purposes on land and sea. Five hundred and fifty millions for preparedness. No foe in sight. Not even Japan or England or France. Our allies confederated with us in a treaty of disarmament. And Germany prostrate. No man will deny the fact of our ability to give this relief; and there is far more of reason in these $10,000,000 than in the $550,000,000 annually wasted for militarism in America.

But not only does this relief appeal to my mind as reasonable, but also to my conscience as right. Whether Germany was wrong or wronged is not at issue here. The war is over and the penalties have been assessed. But taking an account of stock after the war, it is difficult to point out one righteous thing that was settled by it. In the last campaign I asked my constituents in a score of speeches made in a county which was the hotbed of opposition to me six years ago what good thing came to the world or to the United States out of the war? What great principle was settled right? I paused for an answer, but no answer came. Speaking in the county seat of another county, however, I did get an answer from a man in a front seat, who yelled out "Not a damn thing." In what he intended to say he was right. But strictly construed, he was mistaken. We got many "a damn thing" out of the war. Evils were multiplied. The aftermath of the war is still with us heavily. Sherman was right when he said, "War is hell." Hell produces no other fruitage than more hell.

During the propaganda for war the charge was made that Germany began the war and that German militarism was a menace to the world. The stories of German atrocities filled the press, and likewise Germany's plan to cross the ocean to conquer Uncle Sam. Uncle Sam's righteous wrath was aroused. He entered for the first time war in Europe, disregarding the sage advice of George Washington. He sent over millions of men and billions of dollars for what he thought was a war to end war, for humanity and for the freedom of nations. But he is now a sadder and, perhaps, a wiser man. The revelation of the secret treaties, clearer light on the so-called atrocities, the absurdity of Germany's intent to conquer America, and the utter failure of peace, freedom, and humanity in the world has completely restored him to reason.

Indeed, Uncle Sam knows that there was guilt on the part of all nations. To-day he beholds France and England at odds. France has now become twice as militaristic as was ever Germany. France is now the menace to the peace of the world. As for atrocities, her maintaining the black troops on the Rhine and her seizure of the Ruhr do not appear to him as consistent with a belief in chivalrous and liberty-loving France.

Certainly Uncle Sam never made war on the children and women of Germany. President Wilson proclaimed that we were not making war on the German people. It is not, therefore, for Uncle Sam to reply to this appeal for relief to the starving children and women of that country. "It is none of my affair; am I my German brother's keeper?" Uncle Sam is not without responsibility for conditions in Germany. Was it not he who came to the rescue of France and England, fighting with their backs against the wall, and who finally overthrew the German forces? Was it not he whose word was so potent in bringing about the ruthless armistice and whose pen dictated the harsh treaty of Versailles? Does not Uncle Sam now silently sanction the seizure of the Ruhr by France, well knowing that it is France's purpose to destroy the German people? He certainly has made but a very feeble protest.

Let him beware of self-righteousness and hypocrisy. There is a Judge who looks to the heart, who knows that Uncle Sam, too, was not without blame for going into this adventure of a world war. He can not say to this Supreme Judge when asked, "Where are thy brother's starving and dead children, 'I know not; am I my brother's keeper?'" lest he shall hear these fateful words: "What hast thou done? Thy brother's blood calleth to me from the ground." It is because I wish to avert the curse of God upon my country that I would make this public acknowledgment that we are no longer the German people's foes but friends and brothers.

Not only is this relief reasonable and right but it appeals also to my heart as of the loftiest spirit of humanity. There is too much of hate in the world. The spirit of hate is destructive. Its fruitage is starvation, disease, and death. What the world needs is human love. Love is the cement of society. Love binds together and builds up home, country, and the whole human family.

This relief of $10,000,000, taking the form of bread, fats, milk, and other foodstuffs, will speak more eloquently to the heart of Germany and to the world for peace and good will on earth than all the five hundred and fifty millions that we are again voting for purposes of war on land and sea. When will human beings understand the folly of hate and war and the wisdom of love and peace?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as this measure before us is an expression of the highest sentiments of the human soul, righteousness, reason, and love, I am for the rule and for the relief that this rule gives a right of way. I did what I could for both before the steering committee. I voted for a favorable report as a member of the Committee on Rules, and I am for this relief to the distressed and starving children and women of Germany—mind, conscience, and heart approving my action. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I can not conscientiously support the pending resolution, and, therefore, to be consistent in my position, I shall vote against the adoption of the rule. I base my opposition to this proposition very largely upon the specific ground that in my deliberate opinion—and I have tried to give it careful consideration—there is no warrant in the Constitution of the United States which justifies the Congress of the United States in voting out of the Treasury for the benefit of suffering foreign populations sums of money paid into the Treasury by taxation for public purposes. I am not here posing as the guardian of any other man's legislative conscience. I am only expressing my own views on the question, and when the matter was before the Committee on Rules I tried to secure from the proponents of the resolution some authority as to the constitutional justification for this resolution, and up until this good hour I have heard no gentleman who has been able to quote any provision of the Constitution of the United States which justifies an appropriation of this character. We all stood here and took this oath:

I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

I can not regard that obligation lightly or as a mere trivial formula of service as a Representative. To me it is a solemn thing.

Abraham Lincoln, in his Cooper Union speech, February 17, 1860, said:

No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

There are gentlemen here who will to-day vote for this measure who might well ponder the admonition of one of the great men who largely founded the Republican Party.

In the Committee on Rules I asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON], who is a very earnest advocate of this legislation, how he justified a vote for a resolution of this sort, and he said it might be justified upon the theory of maintaining the public health of this country in that if this period of starvation continues in Germany they might have there an epidemic of typhus fever, and that by some tortuous method it might be conveyed back into the United States and, therefore, as a matter of justification in the preservation of the public health of this country we should vote this $10,000,000 out of the Treasury. That is the nearest to any constitutional justification I have heard. Oh, they will cite precedents, of course, but I do not believe that the Constitution can be defended and supported by deliberately violating its provisions. In the course of this debate I should like to hear some of the able and learned attorneys who have given this matter consideration point out what, in their opinion, is the constitutional authority for this legislation. Or course, I do not mean by that precedents, because many can be cited.

Here is how I feel about the proposition, and I think I have ordinarily as sympathetic an attitude toward humanity as any other man. I try to be as liberal in my personal gifts as my means will justify, but this is not a question of that character. We are asked here to go into the Treasury of the United States and take out of it money that the taxpayers of this country, out of their toll and sweat and labor, went down in their pockets and paid into the Treasury, and deliberately to give it away to a foreign population. If we can give away $10,000,000 of the taxpayers' money for purposes of this sort we can give away every dollar in the Treasury of the United States as a logical conclusion. I regard myself in a measure as a trustee of the taxpayers, and here is a specific fund of my people in part with which we are dealing. I say that the way these things ought to be handled is by soliciting funds from the public, and it can be raised in that way as it has been done before. But, say others, that is too much trouble; that will take too long; it will involve probably some delay. The easier matter, of course, is to pass a joint resolution granting it out of the Treasury of the United States.

I protest against this measure as not only unconstitutional but as inexpedient and unwise, and also as unfair to the taxpayers of America. How can we reduce taxes if we give away millions at a clip out of the public funds? My constituents have not authorized me to do so, and I will not, by my vote, contribute to this tapping of the public till. I have a right to give away what belongs to me, but I have no right to give away that to which I own no title.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this is not a partisan matter, because at the outset of this debate on the rule I disagree with my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. BANKHEAD]. It is not a partisan question; it is a question of charity.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Will the gentleman point out the provision in the Constitution of the United States that authorizes this legislation?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I shall not point it out except to refer you to the "general welfare" clause, and I am confident that position is going to be presented very ably by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Another question, please. Does not the general welfare clause apply only to the United States and not to foreign nations?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Not by specific or direct language.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know the reaction on this proposition many may experience. What I hope is not going to happen here to-day is that the war is going to be fought over again. No such thing enters into this proposition. I might say in passing, and I do not say it offensively to anybody, that many people during the war had hate for the German people—and I use the word "hate" advisedly—or had repulsion at the mere word "German." No German blood courses through my veins. My district is not German; so I, for one, approach the subject with an open mind.

If any Member of this House would take the time to read the minutes of the hearing before the Foreign Affairs Committee and then sit down and say conscientiously, barring this question of constitutionality, "I will not help these German women and children, even though we have to place our hands in the Treasury," I can not figure him anything but a partisan, not in politics but in nationality. You will be told what is happening in Germany, a great nation of 60,000,000 people, with 20,000,000 starving, and we are asking only $10,000,000 for the women and children who are starving and dying for bread to put in their mouths. It costs but 50 cents a month for a starving little baby to give it more milk than it gets to-day, and the testimony shows that in the hospitals they are receiving only a teaspoonful of milk.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I will.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. If the men should all die, would it not be hard on the women?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Well, if you mean certain men died, I might answer yes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I was not referring to Members of Congress. I was referring to the Germans.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Well, I do not know how to answer that, Mr. Speaker, except to say that I am not particularly concerned with the men of Germany. One can feel in any way he wants toward them. You can hate them and their officers and their soldiers who went through Belgium and all that, but you can not hate these little children, many of whom were born after the war. We can argue and it may be argued here to-day—and I fear it will be, but I hope it will not be—about retribution, about spite and hate entering into this matter. Will any living human being here support the principle of retribution, that the sins of the fathers shall be visited upon the young? That is what you say if you deny relief to these children.

Now the war is over. We are at peace with Germany. As has been said, the other nations, her former enemies—France and England—are helping these women and children.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I will.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman from Michigan made a statement that many of the other countries had aided Germany, and the gentleman is now making a similar statement. Can the gentleman cite whether any other nation has given aid out of public funds raised by taxation?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I can not state it.

Mr. VAILE. Has the gentleman any information of the subject?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I am relying on my recollection of the testimony, but that will be sufficiently covered by others in the debate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. The witnesses before the Foreign Affairs Committee were not Germans. They were Americans testifying to the appalling conditions of these women and children. Can anyone say Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen is biased? He fought Kaiserism, yet he tells us of these 2,500,000 babes being ground in the mills of international dispute. They are destitute of food, of clothing, of fuel. Tuberculosis is rampant.

Mr. Speaker, this proposal would do more toward promoting international friendship than anything yet suggested. We have the wealth of the world. Our foodstuffs are rotting on the ground. Shall we begrudge these sufferers this crumb until their harvest in July?

Let us call Mr. Herbert Hoover as an authority on these conditions existing in Germany. He has told of conditions there. In his words we—can argue very heartily on the failure of adults and the misdoings of the governments that bring these conditions about, but I refuse to apply these arguments to children.

Germany would not need our aid if she could obtain the $70,000,000 she asked leave to borrow three months ago through the Reparations Commission. At the present moment, however, there is no assurance she will obtain this loan before these innocent sufferers shall have been laid in their graves.

Gentlemen, read the testimony, please. Picture, if you can, these children, the weakened, expressionless faces, narrow chests, covered with skin so flabby that it folds over their bones like a cloak; their deformed and twisted bodies, often too apathetic and too weak to cry. The hospitals are filled with such little angels.

Food lines—thousands of men, women, and children waiting 20 hours in the cold of winter for a meager ration! Educated, cultured women lying in wait in the streets begging and fainting, and dying from hunger. Thousands of children living exclusively on dry bread and thin coffee without any milk. Suicides increasing daily.

Mr. Speaker, whether one is pro-French or pro-German or simply indifferent to the squabbles of Europe, he can not remain indifferent to this proposition, because every good, red-blooded American is always emphatically prochildren. The American people never did and, please God, never shall believe in making war on women and children!

There may be some who out of hate for Germany during the war may never forget. Possibly some may never forgive. But who, Mr. Speaker, will continue to bear this malice for all time and against women and children? Should we not be guided by the sportsmanlike gallantry of Grant toward the indomitable Lee—heroic in defeat, unconquerable in spirit? Should we not be inspired by those words of the immortal Lincoln, "With malice toward none, with charity for all"?

Mr. SCOTT. Does the gentleman desire to use more time now?

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. No.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. [Applause.]

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that no father, or any person who has come in contact with tender babyhood, could read the hearings on this bill and not be for it. I have three youngsters, two bouncing boys, one tender, dimpled, tangle-curly headed little girl. She will be 4 her next birthday, and just the other evening before going to bed she crawled upon my lap, rubbed her nose against mine, and said to me, "Daddy, can't you see me?" I said, "No; little curlyhead, I can't." After a moment of silence she said, "Well, your heart sees me, doesn't it, Daddy?" In her childish philosophy she encompassed life. It is the heart that sees aright. The vision of the heart is the true guide. The heart is the foundation of whatever power and greatness there is in man or woman or nation. [Applause.]

Because the politician Pontius Pilate evaded the answer to the question, "What is truth?" our Master was crucified, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

When God asked King Solomon what he most desired, he answered:

Give me a heart of understanding, that I may discern between right and wrong.

That is the only question involved in this bill to-day. What is right and what wrong? There ought not to be any hesitancy in the heart of any Member, when 3,000,000 babies are crying for food, starving. It is a question of humanity. We are in luxury. No one over here but the farmer is in need, and this $10,000,000 which must be spent right here for food, grains, and fats will benefit the very class in this country most in need, for it will be purchased direct from the farmer and afford him that market for which he is in such woeful distress.

It is inconceivable to think of the United States standing calmly by, well fed and sleek, while little children are wasting away with hunger, dying in awful agony, while misery on the most enormous scale is crushing out life. Surely the framers of the Constitution, built upon equality of brotherhood, never meant that it should shackle a generous impulse, place a barrier before a righteous act. And yet these Pontius Pilates wash their hands in smug self-justification, though they find no fault with the facts that inspired this bill. [Applause.]

Under express declaration of the President, we fought the system, not the German people. These are the innocent victims of that system; and we can not sit by and see another militaristic system, reared in part upon our money and our efforts, do the thing our boys fought to put down.

The need is an imminent emergency. He gives twice who gives quickly. They are starving now; they will be dead; and it will be too late if we do not get the machinery in motion.

The testimony of the hearings stands undisputed that there are rows on rows of tubercular babies in the hospitals in a country where formerly tuberculosis in children was practically unknown; that there are to-day in Germany little children screaming from the awful torments of starvation on whose gaunt forms there is not one ounce of muscle or fat, whose skin is stretched taut across their bones, whose little bodies are but life in death, living skeletons; that thousands upon thousands of little ones are suffering from hunger-bred rickets, twisted out of all semblance of childhood's proper forms, their abdomens distended, their limbs shrunk and wasted.

Eyewitnesses testify to seeing children fainting in the street from hunger after having stood in line all day, from 3 o'clock in the morning, to get the dole of a pound of potatoes which is allotted every other day to each member of a family, and little children found dead in the streets, in the alleys, clutching in their tiny emaciated hands a partly eaten potato or crust of bread, the other part having been too suddenly taken into a starving stomach. These are actual conditions, seen by big-hearted Americans without a drop of German blood in their veins, who went as travelers, but stayed to help, stricken to the heart by the awful misery on all sides. This while our tables are groaning with plenty, our surplus crying for a market, our crops allowed to rot in the field because there is no outlet for them. Even Russia in her poverty is collecting gifts of pence from the workers for the relief of the suffering at her door. French occupants in the Ruhr can not look on unmoved at the horrors that the despotic hand of the conqueror has brought on a defeated and defenseless people and are putting no obstacles in the way of the voluntary helpers who are trying to aid the situation.

In the name of all those loyal Germans in this country who denied the pull of tender ties and stood unflinchingly by the cause of their adopted land, in the name of those boys of German blood who volunteered without an instant's hesitation and rendered service to the United States in deeds that blaze with heroism, and more than all, in the name of childhood, tender, appealing babyhood that should be so protected and surrounded with well-being and comfort, I appeal to you men and fathers to come to the aid of these little ones. Lighten the cross that is too heavy for their suffering little lives to endure. Save them, give them back their health and their opportunity. Eighty-three cents a month in our money will spare the life of a child. Can we hesitate or quibble in the face of such proven distress, destitution, and grief? The deaths are so many that the German Government is not giving out the figures. Despair is driving many to suicide.

France, by its greed and its strangle hold on Germany's coal region, its giving away of Germany's best agricultural land to Poland, has reduced by 50 per cent Germany's food-producing ability. Then, too, by being deprived of the coal of the Ruhr, which they must have to produce fertilizer, their soil is being continually impoverished and their output still further cut. Even if they have money or property they can not trade it for food, because the mark has no value outside Germany, and there is no food in Germany. Food packages to the value of $5,000,000 a month are being sent in from this country by people of German blood to their relatives, but even with this outside aid there will be, it is estimated from the visible food supply, 20,000,000 human beings in starvation throes between April and November. France's policy is slowly starving a people of 60,000,000 to death. They can not ask for a loan, because France has a mortgage on everything they have.

This proposed measure is the only way that relief can get where we want it to go—to the babies—the innocent, suffering little ones. I have no fear of what the American people will think. The great heart of America never failed to respond to a plea for actual need. There are 70 precedents in the history of our country for this act. Two're times we have appropriated money for distress. We appropriated $20,000,000 for Russian relief two years ago. The Government aided the starving women and children in Belgium and France and the Balkan States. America responded instantly to the need of the Japanese in their recent frightful devastation by earthquake.

We gave our suffering allies $100,000,000 at the close of the war, $48,000,000 of which was transferred to Austria by three of our allies, none giving us any credit for it. The League of Nations passed a loan to the starving Austrians of $50,000,000, $25,000,000 of which the United States gave. Of all the speakers on this project, representing our recent allies, no one gave the United States credit for a penny, but did not neglect to laud themselves whether they gave anything or not. And the sum total of all who joined this self-praise amounted to far less than the United States gave alone. And yet this wonderful League of Nations is composed of our recent allies! And many of our uninformed but well-meaning citizens seem bound to drag us into it, regardless of consequence.

The Austrians do not know to-day that they were the recipients of over $70,000,000 worth of food from the United States.

I talked but yesterday to my friend, HAMILTON FISH, of New York, who is the author of this bill and who led a colored Infantry regiment and was decorated for bravery in actual conflict amid the smoke and welter and carnage of the French battle front. This gallant soldier and fearless, conscientious statesman has recently returned from a visit to Germany. He says there is a propaganda studiously circulated in Germany that the United States went into the war to make money. He heard it in crams, in shops, in streets, in hotels, everywhere. Even our recent allies, instead of squelching these outrageous lies, are silent. So far from making money, the war lost us $50,000,000,000, 125,000 lives, and untold thousands of maimed, crippled, despondent American citizens for whom the Government is paying in part compensation yearly millions and millions of dollars. We wanted nothing, we got nothing out of it, and Germany ought to know. If we give this money now when they need it, it will bring to their attention that we are their brothers and their friends, and the time will not be far distant when, in the working out of the hugely unjust Versailles treaty, if Europe is again in war, we may need them.

In any event, we will be doing our duty as God would have us do it. We can not let prayers for help go up and close our ears against them. We must save these little ones lest their minds and their bodies be permanently blighted. Because they have not food enough they are forced to the policy of letting the weaker die and putting what food they have into the stronger. Lives are being snuffed out daily that could be saved and made an asset to humanity. They are being robbed of their right to a fair start in life through no fault of their own. We have what they need. Shall we withhold it? Shall we fail in our chance to distinguish the Holy Grail, to see the bidding of the Master in these pleading little hands outstretched to us for aid? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York use some of his time? If not, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we should, of course, all prefer that provision be made for this frightful situation by private benevolence. But the emergency is so pressing that action by the Government and an appropriation from the Federal Treasury are necessary.

I wish to call attention, first, to the international situation. The Great War has left a legacy of hatred and vindictiveness which threatens the very existence of civilization. The threat of chaos rests upon the world. Europe is seething with feelings of repulsion. There is but one nation in the world that can stand out prominently for peace and good will, and that is our own United States. It is not enough that we should spread and swell in a stuffed prosperity. We owe a duty to the rest of the world. We have declined to join the League of Nations. We have not yet, although I hope we may, become a member of the International Court, but there is one great field in which we can take part, and that is in the holy cause of humanity, in helping the suffering and the starving. Some one who has not seen the suffering in Germany, some one that does not hear and know about conditions there, ought to raise the constitutional question. I can not do it. [Applause.]

There are millions of women and children on the very edge of starvation. The anguish of the women is not alone on their own account, but for their precious offspring. The children are even worse off. Their wan, pale faces seem to utter a mute, inarticulate protest against existence, but louder than words, with no language but a cry. If they had the gift of speech, they would ask, "Why were we brought into this scene of sorrow and of pain?"

Now it is for us to aid them.

I will not let go by the question of constitutionality. The general welfare clause of the Constitution has had very different interpretations, but there is a plain reason for its application to this question. For the promotion of peace and in the cause of liberty and free government, we spent tens of billions of dollars for war. Can we not after a victorious peace spend a smaller amount—the strikingly disproportionate sum of $10,000,000—for the permanence of peace and the restoration of good-will? Is it not for the general welfare of this country, for furnishing a market for our abounding surplus, that a nation with which we have such social and economic relations as we have with Germany should not fall into decay? Is it not for our interest to prevent the pangs of hunger from causing the spread of revolution and Bolshevism in Europe?

Again, if starvation should gain the prominence which it threatens, contagious diseases would spread from that country to this. Under this general welfare clause, beginning 112 years ago, we have made many appropriations of this nature. In the month of April, 1812, there was a discussion in this body on the granting of relief to sufferers in Venezuela, because of an earthquake, and a resolution for an appropriation of $50,000 was offered.

Mr. John C. Calhoun, afterwards the prince of strict constructionists, earnestly supported that resolution. It unanimously passed this House. And what did our President, James Madison do, the scholar of the Constitutional Convention, who had as much to do in the framing of the Constitution as anyone? Did he raise the point of strict construction upon it? No. He approved that resolution. And in the years from then until 1916 some 70 resolutions and bills granting aid have passed in this House, of which 12 or more were for the relief of suffering abroad, including relief to Ireland, India, Cuba, China, and those on the island of Martinique, to the people of Italy who had suffered from the earthquake near Messina, and quite recently, in 1921, $20,000,000 to Russia. In my judgment those benefactions are among the proudest distinctions of this country of ours.

I stood here and saw, by unanimous vote, $800,000 appropriated in 1909 for the relief of the sufferers in Italy, and I think it did more to promote peace and good will than anything we did in that session.

Why, gentlemen, to-day $76,000,000 is due to the United States Treasury for supplies furnished to various countries by the American Relief Association and $56,800,000 for money paid from the Treasury by the United States Grain Corporation. Both amounts at present might be increased to cover large arrears in interest payments. We call these loans, but if we have the authority to make loans for supplies for the suffering and starving of other countries, do we not have the right to freely and generously give supplies? The proposition was made before the committee to make this a loan. For one, I opposed it. I thought if we did anything we ought to do that which had character in it—make it a gift and give it to the German people.

During the last year of the war and in the years succeeding authorization was made for loans and gifts to foreign countries aggregating the enormous sum of $177,558,000. In this amount are included advances made by the American Relief Administration and the United States Grain Corporation. A very recent case of foreign relief is the expenditure by the Navy Department for aid to Japan following the earthquake, amounting to $700,000. Appropriation by Congress has not yet been made for this amount, but it is expected that it will be made. Was the question of constitutionality ever raised in these cases? From the appropriation of $50,000,000 for national defense in the sundry civil act of 1919 President Wilson made allotments of $10,000,000 for European relief. Was the question of constitutionality raised in this connection?

Oh, Mr. Speaker, in face of the pressing demands and the terrible situation in Germany, we ought not to hesitate. The world is torn and rent with feuds; peace seems far off; but at least we hope that the tempest may be stilled and antagonisms may be buried. It may be only a dream; at any rate it is a time for forgetting and forgiving. These poor babes did not bring on the war; they did not whisper in the ears of the Kaiser to take up the sword; most of them were not born at the time, and this country of ours, so rich and so great, can do nothing better to promote the cause of peace, which we all love so well, to bring a brighter day, than by showing that the heart of the American people is behind this measure; that we are not waiting for private benevolence, though we trust that may be abundant and that we will all do our share; but that we have an ever-living regard for suffering and sorrow, even to the remotest bounds, even in the country of an enemy, as making so strong an appeal to us that we, the Congress of the United States, from out of the abundance of our Treasury will devote money to save the lives of the starving and suffering women and children of Germany. [Applause.]

The following is a list of appropriations made from the year 1803 down to the present. It is probable that some are omitted. Note that provisions for relief from floods on the Mississippi River make up a considerable share.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it was my fortune to take a part in the last war, and I saw active service in France and Germany. While so engaged I did not bear any hatred toward the German people in the aggregate. [Applause.] When I laid aside my uniform any hostility that I might have had was laid aside with it. [Applause.]

I would be only too glad to contribute out of my slender means toward any amount that was to be used for this purpose, but I have a duty to perform here this afternoon. I am not acting as an individual but as a trustee for the people of the United States of America, and, God giving me the strength, in spite of these moving appeals, I am going to remain true to that oath.

Let us look at Article I, section 8, of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Of what? Of these United States and not of the entire world. Who are we to sit here and take the money of the people of America and parcel it out to charity? The Government has no business in charity; its duty is to run the machinery of this Nation.

I am only too glad to contribute to this movement; in fact, in all honesty, I can say that three times since January 1 it was my privilege, out of my slender means, to contribute to the starving children of Germany, and I am glad to do it as an individual; but, gentlemen, we have not the right to take the people's money and apply it for this purpose under the authority from which we gain all the power we have.

Therefore, while I agree with the moving appeals which have been made as to the worth of this cause, am I to understand that the American people have sunk so low in charity that if this movement, properly headed, were properly called to their attention they will not respond with this $10,000,000 and render this relief? I believe they will, and they are the proper agency through which to do it, and not through us. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the only argument we have heard against the adoption of this rule is that there is no provision of the Constitution that permits this appropriation.

We are told that the Government should distribute no charity. That the Supreme Court has never passed on the question whether the Congress had the power to make appropriations of this character. If we violate the provisions of the Constitution in passing this resolution, we will simply do exactly what has been done by many Congresses that have sat in this Hall before us. When a man comes to our door starving and in great need, we do not say to him that we have a duty to perform to the charitable society, and that under its constitution we can not help him. No; we do not do that; we extend to such a sufferer immediate help and assistance and attempt to relieve his distress. [Applause.]

We ask for the passage of this resolution in the name of the helpless mothers and hungry children of Germany.

They have done no wrong, they are the innocent sufferers swept on the shoals of adversity by the receding tides of the World War. Mutely they stretch out their hands and look to America to alleviate their distress. Will we stand by with the accumulated wealth of the world and surplus foodstuffs rotting on the ground and watch these helpless women and children slowly starve to death?

The generous spirit of America will never permit this. America that has always responded to the call of distress from every clime. America that has helped France, Great Britain, Belgium, Italy, Russia, other European States, and Japan will respond in her usual broad, noble, and generous manner and send food to the needy mothers and hungry little children of Germany.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the gentleman from New York how much time he has remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has 16 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Michigan has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as you see, I have knocked down the Constitution and that is what we are trying to do now [applause], judging from some of the remarks made on this subject.

In this very brief time I shall cut out some of the sob machinery that seems to be at work in this House. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]—and I was surprised to hear him say it—said, "I will leave it to others to invoke the Constitution of the United States." That is the very trouble with this country to-day. It is, "The Constitution be damned." [Applause.]

As far as I am concerned, I expect to cast every vote under the Constitution of the United States, and if the time comes when I want to say "To hell with the Constitution" then I want to say to you frankly that I will resign and go home. [Applause.]

This has already been called to your attention, but I want to refer to it once more. This is section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, and I will venture to assert that there are not 50 Members of the House who have read it this session:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises—

For what purpose?—
to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

If any man in this House will show me where it includes Germany or any other nation in this world, then I will vote for your resolution. The truth about the matter is that you want to go into the charity business. If you want this Congress to be a charity broker, then I call your attention to the fact that, according to reliable statistics, 10,000,000 Mexicans—I do not mean Mexicans, either, but Chinamen—are starving now—and they have starvation in Mexico.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Yes.
Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman agree with most people in the world that charity extended in the past to destitute nations has always redounded to the interest and welfare of the United States itself?

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. No, sir; and I defy the gentleman to sustain that.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about it. It has always proven to be so.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for an argument, because my time is limited, but I want to defy the gentleman to point to one decision under the Constitution of this country ever rendered by any court of this country that will authorize us to make this expenditure. The gentleman can not do it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I can refer you to 70 precedents and to many Presidents of the United States who have acted accordingly.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. The gentleman can not do it. The truth about the matter is that, as Sam Jones once said, "A hit dog hollers," and I defy the gentleman to show one decision of the courts rendered under the Constitution that authorizes this expenditure. [Applause.]

I have sat here and have seen them vote $20,000,000 for Russian relief, and the truth is that this proposition is one to vote $10,000,000 to buy votes, and when asked a reason for doing it they hide behind the petticoats of women and children.

I am aware that there are congressional precedents for appropriations and gifts of this kind, but I can not bring myself to the conclusion that I ought to follow a wrong and illegal precedent. Under the oath I took as a Member of this House, and in view of the plain constitutional provisions which I have quoted, I can not support this resolution. That provision of the Constitution states specifically for what purposes taxes may be levied and collected, and, in my judgment, when we otherwise apply the money which has been collected from the taxpayers of this country for these specific purposes it simply constitutes embezzlement. This $10,000,000 of the people's money which you are giving away to-day was wrung from the overburdened taxpayers of this Nation for the purposes mentioned in the Constitution and not for charity. I believe in charity and have always practiced it to the extent of my ability. It has properly been called "the star-eyed queen of all virtues." But it has its proper place just like everything else. This is a question of not what we would like to do. It is a question of what we have a right to do and of what we have sworn to do. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] asks the question:

Can we not spend ten millions for the permanence of peace and the restoration of good will?

I want no one's friendship that I have to purchase, and while I would rejoice to see our country enjoying the friendship and good will of all the nations of the earth, yet I am not willing to vote to purchase such good will out of the trust funds of the people. Friendship purchased is a very sorry sort of a thing and not worth the price. I do not believe that the conditions in Germany are such that they can not be taken care of by her own people. From reading articles written by people who have been there and talking to some people who have been there, I am persuaded that Germany is able to relieve her own suffering. A news dispatch from Paris, under the date of March 18, and printed in the Times-Picayune under date of the 19th instant, states:

PARIS, March 18.—The controversy within the conference of experts relative to Germany's capacity to pay has developed revelations in the evasion of German capital which appear to justify the French demand of immediate payments.

The methods employed by the Germans in their gigantic international swindle, as fully investigated by the McKenna committee, have been shown the correspondent in documentary form by one of the officials close to the conference.

This report indicates that the $1,200,000,000 salted away in the United States is only one portion of Germany's wealth hidden from the Allies.

The document reads in part:

"Before receiving authority to export goods German tradesmen may declare their view and hand to the Reichbank against paper marks at the official rate of the day the foreign money they receive. They may, however, deduct 50 per cent from their invoices to cover expenses and with the help of some neutral intermediary are thus able to invest huge sums of money abroad to the credit of their firms.

"Export of capital is also permitted to pay just debts abroad, hence the creation of imaginary debts in neutral countries. "Debts" are allowed to remain outstanding on increasingly usurious terms until large sums have been sent into safety from Germany to "settle" them.

"Patent rights have been used to the same end. German investors and manufacturers have founded companies in neutral countries to demand from the German patent office patents for German inventions. The factory where the invention is made has then to pay royalties to a neutral company for the use of its own invention."

But if the women and children of Germany are suffering so much as some of those favoring this resolution claim, then why can not we meet it by public and private subscription, just as we have met and aided and assisted Japan last year when she was torn asunder by a terrible earthquake? Why did not the charity brokers of the people's money—which is but a trust fund for us—who have proposed this legislation offer an appropriation for Japan? My thought is that it is because the Japanese can not vote. Should not charity begin at home anyway? Do we not have much poverty and misery and suffering here in the United States? This talk of prosperity in this country, like the report about Mark Twain's death, has been "greatly exaggerated" and overworked. According to statistics, 1 farmer out of every 12 lost his home in 1923 for debts. Ten thousand farmers in the United States out of fifty-nine thousand farmers would have lost their farms, but were given more time by their creditors. Many farms were sold last year and this year for taxes. A multitude of farmers have no money now with which to make a crop, and many families are actually suffering. We have crowded tenements in our cities, poor people in filth and disease and suffering from starvation. If you are going to give the people's money away to buy the peace and good will of Germany, then why not buy the peace and good will of China and Mexico in the same manner? Is it because of German-American votes? Our Constitution contains no charity provision for foreign countries. Years ago when Savannah, Ga., was swept by fire and many people rendered homeless Congress refused to make an appropriation, and we have had many calamities in this country for which no appropriation was ever made. That was a time, however, when there seemed to be more reverence for our supreme law than we have now. During the Cleveland administration a part of my own State was swept by a drought and young cotton destroyed, and an appropriation was passed by the Senate and the House to aid the farmers in the drought-stricken areas and Cleveland vetoed it.

Would it not have been better to have applied the $20,000,000 voted for Russian relief in the Sixty-seventh Congress and this $10,000,000 to the payment of the people of the South for the illegal cotton tax levied in 1867? Years ago Ireland suffered from a potato blight and the generous people of the United States helped her out of their own private funds and not out of the taxpayers' money by an appropriation through Congress. The same may be said of the famines which have swept China and India and some other countries. Our people have never failed to answer the Macedonian call by going down in their own pockets and out of their own private funds contributing what they thought they were able to contribute. Why is it that this Congress, under Republican leadership, is giving right of way to matters of this kind and neglecting more important matters which directly affect our own people? Why is it that of the many bills pending in this Congress which seek to give relief to agriculture all are swept aside for measures of this kind, and why is it that the immigration bill is ignored for legislation of this kind?

In a recent issue of the Brooklyn Eagle, that paper stated:

The Johnson bill on immigration, which goes back to the 1890 census as a quota basis and reduces the quota from 3 to 2 per cent, is practically dead. It has been placed at the end of the House Calendar, and both NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, the majority leader of the House, and Chairman SNELL, of the Rules Committee, are perfectly willing to leave it there. When, near the end of the session, the Johnson bill is rescued from oblivion, the House will have the choice of two courses. It can accept something akin to the Senate measure, which leaves the 1910 census as the basis but reduces the quota from 3 to 2 per cent, or it can pass a resolution continuing the present law for another year.

I am wondering if the statement in the Brooklyn Eagle is true and I am wondering whether the leaders of this House are going to fall to respond to the demands of the people and pass an immigration law in due time and before the present law expires. Time will tell.

Mr. RATHBONE. Mr. Speaker, I am for this resolution, because it will promote good will between nations. The cultivation of international friendship is one of the wisest forms of governmental policy.

In the long run, even in cold, hard dollars it pays. A striking proof of this was shown when we remitted the Boxer indemnity to China. Her people have been our friends ever since and with the money which we so generously gave back to them they have sent their brightest young men to this country to study in American institutions of learning and take back to the mother country American principles and American civilization.

I am for this resolution also because it will provide protection for western civilization against the menace of Bolshevism. If Germany, with its 60,000,000 of people, is permitted to go down in the dust the chief barrier on the continent of Europe against revolution will be swept away. The red specter looms to the east and Germany to-day bars its progress toward the west. If the children of Germany perish, what will prevent the tide of Bolshevism from rolling toward us and menacing the future of the world?

They have told us that this measure is unconstitutional, but no precedents have been cited. This resolution can be defended under the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution. It will both provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare.

It is universally recognized that contemporaneous construction is one of the best of all tests as to the meaning of any document. We have the precedent of the Congress of 1812, which appropriated $50,000 for the relief of Venezuela. The men who passed that measure were contemporaries of the fathers of the Constitution and founders of the Republic. We can not presume to call ourselves wiser than they in construing that immortal instrument. They knew, and we have a right to suppose that they knew, the limitations of congressional action and the proper powers of the House of Representatives. If an appropriation to Venezuela was constitutional in 1812, then an appropriation for the starving people of Germany is constitutional in 1924.

But I am not here to pry into musty volumes of law when the cry of suffering humanity rings in our ears. America has always been a nation of the noblest charity. Our country never yet turned a deaf ear nor closed a stony heart to the appeal of the starving and the suffering anywhere in the world. We have always been ready to come to the aid of distressed human beings, no matter who they were nor where they were found. This noble spirit is one of the chief glories of our country.

These people are not our enemies. Whatever may have been the wrongs committed by their former government, these starving children were innocent of any crime. America does not believe in punishing the innocent for the faults of others.

The war is over, and with it let there vanish also the passions engendered by the war. We have heard enough of the hymn of hate; now let us preach the gospel of friendship.

Let us not think of the great struggle, with all its blood and tears. If we think of Germany, let our minds turn to earlier days, when no nations cherished a greater feeling of amity than Germany and the United States. Let us not forget the debt we owe to those who came to the assistance of this country in the days of the American Revolution, to those millions of German blood who have done so much to upbuild this Nation. Let us forget that Germany was the land of Wilhelm and remember only that it was the land of Steuben, DeKalb, and Carl Schurz.

Across the water there are millions of children who can not play, who have lost even the desire to play. There they are, listless, pale, emaciated, stunted, undernourished, in patched rags, exposed to the storm, their faces pinched and drawn, their eyes dull and deep circled, living skeletons—even babies feebly walling over a misery they can not comprehend, but can only feel, handicapped at the very outset of the race of life, who, even if they live, without food can never grow up into strong, vigorous men and women. We can fill these hearts with joy, those homes with light. We can say to these children, "Live and grow, live and play, live and be happy."

In this enlightened age we recognize no such thing as vicious sacrifice. Those who have done no wrong should suffer none.

Gentlemen, we are called up to paint a picture of America. Which shall it be? Shall our country be shown to the world as a miser, seated upon his moneybags, gloating over his gold piled mountain high, looking with disdain, with cold indifference on the sufferings of others, with heart of stone, with ears deaf to every cry of human entreaty, with merciless countenance, set like an iceberg, stern and unmelting, against the most harrowing sights in the world, in whose cold eyes the starving children can read but one answer to their cry for bread, "No mercy and no hope?"

Not such is the picture that my imagination paints of our own beloved country. I raise before your eyes another picture, Columbia, strong and great, bending in loving sympathy above the emaciated and prostrate child, pressing to its enfeebled lips from her abundant store the bread that will nourish it back to life, re-create its vigor, stimulate its God-given soul, open the door for mental development, restore to it the natural joys and play of infancy, refute forever the malignant charge that America cares only for gold, and fill millions of human hearts with love and gratitude toward the "wonder Nation," the savior of the children from starvation and death.

Let us hope that it can still be said of America, "the strongest are the tenderest." I want to see my country the leader in everything that is good and great for the welfare of the human race, the economic leader, the financial leader, the commercial leader, the industrial leader of the world; but most of all I want to see this country the humanitarian leader of all nations and to see her set the example to others of forgiveness, benevolence, and mercy toward all mankind.

It is now our opportunity to prove our country such. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

[Mr. CELLER was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, my interest in the adoption of this resolution is measured by the fact that I, too, introduced a resolution in this House to succor, to the extent of $25,000,000, the starving people of Germany.

Circumstances sometimes so shape themselves that even a nation, like an individual, must give charity. It has been said that the deplorable plight in which Germany finds itself at the present time is most pitiful. There women and children are practically dying on their feet. We in America can not close our eyes to this wretched sight nor lend a deaf ear to their plea for charity. Bacon said that there can never be too much charity, and that it was the desire for excess of power that caused the angel to fall, and that it was the desire for excess of knowledge that caused man to fall; but "there never can be a desire for an excess of charity." It can make neither man nor angel—nor nation—fall.

A perfect legalistic argument has been made that there is no warrant in the Constitution for this charitable dole. We always have with us those who split legal hairs. We had them in the times of the Bible. I refer the constitutional lawyers of the House to the parable of the good Samaritan, found in the tenth chapter of St. Luke. There we find that the lawyer asked the question, "And who is my neighbor?" And Christ told him the story of the man who had been attacked by thieves and left in the road, and how the good Samaritan came and bound up his wounds, giving him oil and wine, and putting him upon his beast and directing him to shelter.

I shall vote for the resolution because I am not unmindful of our debt to 30,000,000 people of German blood in our midst. They are more than a fourth of the Nation and will probably pay more than a fourth of this charity. They came to this country in our early history, built our canals and railroads, planted orchards, tilled the soil, went into business, organized churches, reared schoolhouses, and contributed their share to our arts and sciences.

I shall vote for this resolution because I am not unmindful of our incalculable debt to Baron Steuben as Inspector General of Washington's armies, not unmindful of Carl Schurz during the Civil War, not unmindful of what President Adams said in his message to Congress published in 1826:

In the infancy of their political existence, under the influence of those principles of liberty and of right, so congenial to the cause for which we have fought and triumphed, they (the United States) were able to obtain the sanction of but one great and philosophic, although absolute, sovereign in Europe for their liberal and enlightened principles.

That sovereign was the German Frederick the Great.

The gentleman from Virginia, Judge Moore, whose opinions and wisdom I always respect, has stated that the matter should be one exclusively the subject of private charity. In answer I say private charity can not grapple with this enormous problem.

Mr. Hoover has stated that $120,000,000 is needed to prevent 20,000,000 people from starving. Such a task is too gigantic for private charities.

My good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] has stated that "charity begins at home," and that there are a great many tubercular ex-service men. To him I say, two wrongs do not make a right. Surely we must take care of our disabled veterans, but in doing so we must not be blinded to the needs of others.

Objection is made to this largess because of the great sums of money that have been spirited out of Germany. Of course, there will always be in any nation certain rich renegades who in that fashion seek to avoid paying their debts of charity. Furthermore, Germany is entitled to have, and must have, certain credits abroad in order to carry on commerce. Then, too, the amounts of money Germans have in other countries are much exaggerated. It is difficult to see how this transportation of moneys could escape the French, ever on the alert to prevent just such transfers of securities and money.

It is also argued that there are many signs of affluence and even prodigality in Berlin and other cities. It may be that the night life in the German capital is gay, but the frivolity of a comparative few in Leipzig or Dresden or Berlin is no criterion. We see wealthy and flashy people at the Ritz or Plaza Hotels in New York, but it would be idle to judge that therefore all the people of the United States must be teeming in wealth.

We are told that 15 per cent of all German babies under 2 years of age are tubercular, and that since 1914 few, if any, children over 4 years of age have tasted cow's milk. Dr. Haven Emerson, professor of public health at Columbia University, and formerly health commissioner of the city of New York, sent to Germany by the American Committee for the Relief of German Children, in part reports as follows:

• • • If this were due solely to restraint in child bearing, and to a conscious and successful effort to raise the standard of living, one could envy such a record; but the facts are that stillbirths have increased, mothers have died more from puerperal fever, fewer mothers can nurse their babies—scarcely 50 per cent—and in some places not more than one-third. Nursing is for a shorter period and the amount of milk in most cases is not more than half that usually given by German mothers.

• • • Never in the history of the country has Germany's general death rate or her infant mortality rate been as low as in the years 1920 and 1921, and upon this fact many fallacious arguments have been built. The reasons are quite simple. A rapid fall in the birth rate, amounting to one-third, and in some communities to one-half of the pre-war and the 1919 rate, has reduced very materially the age group of infancy in which the greatest specific death rate occurred. • • • The evidence is overwhelming and universal throughout the Reich that the general death rate and the tuberculosis death rates for all age groups have risen since 1922 very materially.

• • • From infancy to school age marked rickets is so common—anemia, listlessness, poor muscular bone, sunken eyes, and emaciation are so generally seen that one loses a sense of proportion and is inclined to underestimate the extent of depreciation of vitality which is almost everywhere obvious among the children of the wage earners, the lesser public officials, and the 20 to 40 per cent of the adult population who are unemployed.

One, indeed, would be as hard as flint not to be moved by such utter woe and desolation. To deny this charity would be as—

Cruel as the Tartar foe,

To death injured, and nursed in scenes of woe.

In Leviticus we are told that we must leave a corner of the field for the poor, and we are exhorted to shake the olive bough gently, so that a few of the olives might remain as gleanings for the poor, and that when we gather the grapes from the vine we should not take all, as the poor are entitled to their share. We are told to leave a tithe for those in less favorable circumstances, and, indeed, Isaiah says a fifth of our worldly goods should be for charity, for only then will we earn the reward of the Kingdom of Heaven. We should, indeed, abide by these admonitions and extend the hand of charity to Germany.

However, I can not let the occasion go by without saying that despite these Hebraic lessons of charity certain classes of Germans are at work at most uncharitable deeds. I call attention to the Hitlers and the Ludendorffs and their damnable anti-Semitism. They have stirred up a religious blood lust in certain quarters and induced pitiless assaults upon innocent people. Rathenau was murdered. Einstein, author of relativity, flees Berlin in fear of his life.

The poor and suffering women and children, however, are not to blame for this. They need our help. We can not refuse.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the eloquent gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RATHBONE] in his remarks in this debate said that he aspired to see the United States not only the industrial and financial leader of the world but that he aspired to see it the moral leader of the world. I submit that nothing has contributed more to the loss of the moral leadership of America in world affairs than the utter lack of foreign policy on the part of the Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A strong and vigorous policy of the United States directed toward a settlement of the reparation question between Germany and France would do a great deal more good than charitable doles as provided in this bill.

Gentlemen, one of the easiest things in the world to do is to vote away other people's money, and this proposition that we have before us now is to dispense charity at the expense of the American taxpayers.

Mr. RATHBONE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In just a moment. Now, I grant that there may be cases where the emergency is so great and the urgency is so compelling that a proposition of this kind may be justified, but I do not view that situation to exist in Germany at the present time. Why, gentlemen, the American people have always been a generous and charitable people. We have in this country hundreds of thousands of people who are of German blood and lineage and I can not believe that they would be deaf to an appeal of their brethren across the seas, I can not believe that the American people in general would be deaf to such an appeal, but no national appeal of that kind has been made. The Members of Congress who are promoting passage of this bill seem to think that the easier and quicker and the more expedient thing to do is to vote the money out of the pockets of the American taxpayers.

Mr. EAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In a moment; let me complete this statement and then I will be glad to yield. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], for whom I have the highest regard and respect, says that the people of the United States are rolling and reveling in luxury. I do not know what the conditions are in Minnesota, but speaking of the conditions in the district that I represent, I can not say the people are reveling in wealth and luxury. On the contrary, some of them are heavily in debt and are having difficulty in meeting their own obligations. If the State of Minnesota is rolling in luxury and wealth, why have appeals for $75,000,000 out of the Public Treasury to enable the farmers to buy dairy cows and other livestock, as provided in the Norbeck-Burtness bill, been made? Gentlemen know that in the Senate that bill was defeated only a few days ago. The Republican majority would not vote money out of the Treasury to buy livestock for American farmers. The appeal was denied, but now the Republican majority comes forward with a bill to vote $10,000,000 to the people of Germany, and it is readily granted.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EAGAN. I want to remind the gentleman that a nationwide appeal is now being made in behalf of the destitute women and children of Germany, and the people of New Jersey up to March 20 have contributed more than $115,000 in cash toward the fund.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am glad to have the gentleman make the statement. Private subscription is the way the money should be raised. It ought not to come out of the Public Treasury.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I believe that in my heart I have as much of the milk of human kindness for my fellow man as any other man in this House or in the Nation. And with my own money I am generous and liberal, and that is one reason, I suppose, why I have not got any. I want to say that with my own money I stop to remember that "after all he is my brother" and I help him.

But this is the public money, $10,000,000 of it that you are now giving away, as my colleague from Texas has stated, and if you continue setting this precedent it will not be more than 10 or 20 years before every European nation in the world will be depending on the Treasury of the United States in times of an emergency. I am not willing to set that precedent, even in this an election year on the eve of going on the hustings. [Laughter.] I am not willing to say even to the American people of German extraction "I am going to vote to take $10,000,000 out of the people's Treasury of the United States and send it over to Germany just because we are going on the hustings and expect to need their votes." [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this measure is unconstitutional. If you remember a short time ago the Navy of the United States was sent to Japan and some of the Army was there too, and they took part in the rescue relief after the great earthquake. Upon whom was the expense of the great expedition levied? Every dollar came out of the Federal Treasury and every dollar of every expedition that has been sent from America for relief work in foreign lands has been paid for out of the Federal Treasury. It must have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars to send half a fleet to Asia, Europe, or South America or some other continent where disaster has befallen the people, and yet we have done it time and time again. If it is unconstitutional to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury for relief work then we have been engaged in unconstitutional practices for many long years in America. We can not make a miser out of Uncle Sam. It is impossible to say that the only nation he can aid or do anything for is his own Nation. The beloved symbol of Uncle Sam was not created to represent an inhumane Nation. Uncle Sam was created for generous as well as for just purposes. We have struck down an enemy and that enemy's children are starving, and we are asked by those who make the argument that this is unconstitutional to say that not a single dollar of the great wealth of this Nation can be used for taking care of these children.

Yet the same men will admit that if we wanted to we could send the Navy and the Army over there for the purpose of doing rescue work at the expense of Uncle Sam. There is no argument in the proposition that this is an unconstitutional measure. We have been acting under this character of charity for generations, and I am glad to say that the record of America is a noble record in this regard.

I favor the resolution to appropriate $10,000,000 for the benefit of the starving women and children in Germany. Humanity sanctions and blesses the gift. A great and good man in the Bronx—Justice Peter A. Hatting—ever since the war closed has been in charge of a relief organization having for its purpose the same objects as this bill. He told me of the pitiful conditions existing among the German children, the disease and death that has spread among them as a result of starvation. We never fought the German people. Our fight was against the German Government. The Government against which we fought has been destroyed and the people of Germany remain. One of the greatest and noblest acts of mercy we could do would be to pass this bill and start the great work of rescue among the women and children who suffer. We ought to do it, first, because civilization imposes a duty upon all who can afford it to extend help to those who suffer. That duty rests upon nations as well as upon individuals. America has never failed to answer the call of humanity. This is one of the most glorious parts of our record. No matter how powerful we grow, we use that power not to destroy but to help others. The highest test of modern civilization is the mercy and aid it extends to a prostrate foe. In the ancient days the foe conquered in the field was made a slave and held in bondage. To-day the luster of the achievements of men at arms must be supplemented by the benevolence of statesmen toward the conquered, else the purpose of modern government is not attained. This great Government is merely the trustee of God's gifts. He has endowed each man with certain inalienable rights, "the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Our great Government was organized to back up by the force of civil authority those great rights. The Government did not grant them. God is the benefactor, the Government the trustee, and mankind the beneficiary. Since we have assumed the sacred task as a Government to carry out the will of the Almighty, nowhere to-day can we find an opportunity so great as is this one to bring His aid and solace to poor and dying children. The children are God's children. Let us provide for them generously and build up again through this helpless generation the friendship of a century that blessed the relationship of America and the German people.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. OLIVER of New York and Mr. BLANTON were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.]

[By unanimous consent, Mr. McSWEENEY was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McSWEENEY].

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, the constitutionality of this question has been raised, and I have sat for three months in the Agricultural Committee planning some relief for agriculture which may involve the expenditure of many millions. We find that this bill allows us to kill two birds with one stone. We can give at least some relief, although but $10,000,000, to the agricultural interests of America and at the same time carry relief to the suffering people of Germany. Here is an opportunity now for us to allow some of the surplus to be exported to where it will do some good. In my youth I remember reading with much interest the fact that General Grant in his magnanimity gave back to General Lee—that splendid soldier, and America has produced no greater—the horses that had charged the Federal cannon, in order that they might be put back into the field to work with the plow. America when victorious is always magnanimous. We have always realized that to the victor belongs the spoils, but let us distribute them back to a suffering people and bring to them some prosperity. If you were to ask for $10,000,000 to send directly to Germany, I would oppose it, but you are asking for that money with which to purchase American foodstuffs, which in reality will bring some relief to our agricultural interests and at the same time relieve the suffering in Germany. I am heartily in favor of it and hope that the House will do something at this time, not to set a new precedent, but to merely follow the old precedents of America's generosity in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Wood].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if the argument made by gentlemen on the Democratic side of the Chamber were carried to its logical conclusion, this Congress never in the past nor ever in the future could vote a single dollar for charity. Gentlemen from the South say that the Constitution has nothing to do with charity. If that is true, we have been violating the Constitution since its adoption. If that be true, we have violated it time and time again by making generous appropriations for the flood sufferers of the South. If that be true, we have violated it when that great catastrophe came to the city of San Francisco, and when other disasters came to Chicago and to Boston, and when we came to the rescue of the starving people throughout the western part of our country time and time again.

Gentlemen, there is a warrant for this action to-day, and that warrant has been put into execution every time that a suffering people in the world have appealed to the heart and conscience of the people of the United States and we found truth and virtue in their appeal. It ill becomes us now to make an exception in this case because, perchance, this charity goes to a country that was a short time ago at war with us. I saw more suffering in Germany this year than I hope shall ever be my lot to look upon again. I saw some of these suffering babes. Perhaps they have gone over by this time. There are tens of thousands of them there that are starving. It was not an uncommon sight in the city of Berlin, in the city of Munich, in the city of Leipzig, in the morning to see a woman hitched up with a dog hauling a milk cart up alongside of the curb, where there would be a procession of perhaps forty or fifty or a hundred women and girls there with little containers that would not hold over three or four ounces, seeking food for the babies, and half of them would go away with their containers empty because there was not enough milk to go around. At that time Mr. Houghton, our ambassador, told me that by reason of a survey that had been made but a few days before it was ascertained that there was not one-fifteenth part of milk enough to feed the babies in the city of Berlin.

Mr. Speaker, it is responses like the one that we are going to make to-day, as we have made them in the past, that have placed the United States and the American people upon the highest pinnacle of estimation ever occupied by a nation or a people. If we had more of this character of spirit and less of the spirit of hate and of war, there would be less of war in the world. We could afford this appropriation for no other purpose than as a defense measure, because whenever you touch the heart of a man or a woman by such unselfish generosity as this bill proposes you are taking from the heart of that man or woman the spirit of hate and of spite, and if this were practiced the world around there would be no need of our appropriating $300,000,000 in a Navy bill and $250,000,000 in an Army bill. If we were to look at this matter from a purely selfish standpoint without regard to our technical quibbles with reference to constitutional questions, it would be a splendid investment. I am a little amazed to see gentlemen upon the Democratic side occupying the position they are to-day with reference to this proposition. Those of you who were here at the time remember very well that when President Wilson went across to help make the treaty of peace one of the first things he did was to send a dispatch over here asking us to send him $100,000,000 to take care of the starving people in France and Belgium and Italy and other places.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Did anybody vote against that? I understand what the gentleman from Mississippi is going to say; that it was a loan, but as a matter of fact it was a charity, and not one cent of it was ever paid back, and it never will be.

If this donation is made, it will not only save the lives of thousands of German women and children, but it will perform another great service; it will prove a concrete demonstration to the people of Germany that there is no hate in the hearts of American people against the German people.

Repeatedly during the war, President Wilson stated from this rostrum that we have no war to make against the people of Germany. It is against the ruling class that we are directing our forces, and during the last days of the war he appealed to the people of Germany, saying that "if you will throw off the yoke of monarchy and establish some democratic form of government you will be recognized and treated fairly in the treaty of peace that is to be made." They took him at his word, and did change their form of government to a Republic.

If we had no war to make against the German people, then is it not our bounden duty now to show by our acts that our heart of sympathy goes out to the suffering there, and to those who were entirely irresponsible for that war, as it has gone out to sufferers around the world from time to time during the history of our country? Again, it will not only relieve great suffering in Germany, but this gift will prove a blessing to our own people. The farmers of our country are complaining because they can not get prices sufficient for their grain to pay for the raising. This money will be spent in this country, and will in a large measure go directly to the farmer. It will help to stabilize prices of farm products, and increase prices, if you please, of those sold.

Carl Vrooman said, with reference to the $20,000,000 that we gave to Russia, for it has proven to be a gift, that that was a splendid business investment, that every dollar we spent for the relief of Russia brought $10 to the American farmer. In other words, that $20,000,000 invested for the relief of Russia proved a boon amounting to $200,000,000 to the grain producers of the United States.

We are, therefore, amply justified in making this donation; first, and above all, the dictates of humanity justify it; second, the desire of the American people to show to the suffering people of Germany that there is no hatred in our hearts, and never has been in so far as they are concerned, justifies it; the relief that it will bring to the farmers of this country justifies it. In making this donation we will add another laurel to the crown of America's greatness and generosity. By making this donation we will also be making acknowledgment of an appreciation of the friendship of a people that came to our rescue when the very fate of the Nation was trembling in the balance. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired. The previous question is ordered on the resolution. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 158, noes 59.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 180, for the relief of the distressed, starving women and children of Germany; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to come to some arrangement as to who shall have charge of the time provided under this rule, and if Mr. CONNALLY of Texas is to have charge, I would like to make a unanimous-consent request to that effect. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] have half the time provided for by this rule.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The rule, as I understand it, provides that the time shall be divided half for and half against the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Half for and half against, to be equally divided by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and some member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand that almost all the time of the gentleman from New York is pledged to those in favor of the resolution, so if that be true the gentleman from Texas will have to accept the situation and control time against it and yield—

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand—is there any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs opposed to the bill?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am opposed to it.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is really a matter that should be within the jurisdiction of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to whom he should recognize, and naturally he would recognize the ranking member of the minority opposed to the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the gentleman from New York to ask unanimous consent that before going into the Committee of the Whole that he control half the time and the gentleman from Texas half.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to ask unanimous consent; certainly the Chair would recognize—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Chairman would recognize the gentleman. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 180, with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 180, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 180.

For the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany.

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute grain, fats, milk, and other foodstuffs adapted to the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the President, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution: Provided, That the President shall, not later than December 31, 1924, submit to the Congress an itemized and detailed report of the expenditures and activities made and conducted through the agencies selected by him under the authority of this joint resolution: Provided further, That the commodities above enumerated so purchased shall be transported to their destination in vessels of the United States, either those privately owned or owned by the United States Shipping Board.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "foodstuffs" insert the words "for and."

Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "not later than" and insert in lieu thereof "on or before."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the words "to their destination" and in line 12 after the word "vessels" strike out the words "of the United States, either those privately owned or."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. When will it be in order to offer amendments to the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. After general debate. The resolution will then be read. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Newton].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, seven years ago the United States declared war on Germany. At that time Germany had been engaged for three years in a deadly conflict with three of the most powerful nations of Europe. Germany had long prepared for that war, as had likewise her adversaries, and we were told that the Kaiser and his war lords were obsessed with ambitions for conquest and expansion. Our President, who spoke for the Nation and upon whose declared policy this Nation went to war, professed a profound sympathy and friendship for the German people. In the President's message to Congress, which served as a basis for the Nation's declaration of war, he said:

We have no quarrel with the German people; we have no feeling for them but a feeling of sympathy and friendship; we are glad now that we can see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German people included.

It was this declaration of proffered friendship, oft repeated after war was declared, which appealed to the masses in Germany and made them yearn for peace and for freedom, and no one can conjecture how much this proffered friendship contributed toward the banishment of the Kaiser and the sudden termination of the conflict while Germany's soldiers were yet on foreign soil. The President had laid down certain fundamental principles of liberty and justice in which the Allies at that time acquiesced and upon which the President declared that peace should be made. With faith in these lofty ideals declared by the President of these United States and relying upon our pledge of sympathy and friendship for the people of that country, Germany surrendered. After they had surrendered and laid down their arms they were forced to sign the treaty of Versailles under the terms of which France and certain of her allies procured a mortgage upon all the resources and all the credit of Germany.

Immediately after the war ended, and while France and Belgium were victors in the conflict, while their resources were unhampered and their property unpledged, the Congress of the United States appropriated and delivered to these countries

$100,000,000 for the relief of hunger and distress. Some three years later the Congress of the United States appropriated $20,000,000 for relief of hunger and famine conditions in Russia at a time when Bolshevism and communism prevailed in that country and while the representatives and propagandists of those doctrines were trying to undermine and overthrow our free Government. About that time we learned that there was hunger, distress, and suffering in the Balkan States. Congress forthwith appropriated funds, and provided for relief in these countries by supplying them with 10,000,000 barrels of flour. When we learned that there was hunger and suffering in Austria, formerly our enemy, we appropriated and expended, through the United States Grain Corporation, some $72,000,000 for the relief of distress in that country, and to-day Austria is not only dealing with her own problems but is contributing much toward the relief of hunger and starvation in Germany.

There are those in this country, some who are Members of Congress, who pretend to doubt that there is real need for an appropriation from Congress for the relief of hunger and famine conditions in Germany. Much propaganda has been used and much effort has been made to cultivate that impression in this country, and if I may have the attention of this House I will undertake to furnish the proof of a situation among the people of Germany and particularly among the women and children of that unfortunate country, which will justify an appropriation far in excess of the amount provided in the resolution now under consideration.

On the 14th of last December I wrote a letter to Secretary Hughes, calling upon him for official information concerning food and health conditions in Germany. On December 29 last he responded, and in his letter he said:

I have the honor to transmit herewith memoranda on this subject prepared by the appropriate officers of this department. The information contained in the memoranda is based chiefly on reports that have been received recently from our consular and diplomatic officers in Germany.

Only recently a Member of this House said to me:

If I thought there was a real shortage of food in Germany I would be willing to appropriate funds for relief, but as I understand the situation there is plenty of food in that country, but the difficulty results from a lack of proper distribution.

I have repeatedly heard from different persons, some of them Members of this House, this same statement in substance, but what are the facts? Secretary Hughes, in his report to me, said:

Germany has never been self-sustaining in food production. Prior to 1914 she depended upon imports to supply approximately 20 per cent of her requirements. As a result of the war this condition has not improved. The population has not been reduced proportionately with the loss of agricultural territory. It must be borne in mind that the lost territory, especially that in east and west Prussia, comprised some of Germany's most productive grain and potato land.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman tell us why she is so short; she has land there, has she not?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; it is a notable fact that prior to the war Germany's food production was tremendously stimulated by the use of fertilizers made from nitrates which she extracted from the air. It required large quantities of coal to extract nitrates and produce these fertilizers. Her coal fields are now held by France, and she is utterly without fuel with which to produce nitrates. As a result, the yield of her land is far less than it was prior to the war.

In 1913, the year before the war began, according to the official report of Secretary Hughes, Germany produced 171,075,000 bushels of wheat. In 1923, according to the same report, she produced only 103,604,000 bushels of wheat. So that Germany last year produced only 60 per cent as much wheat as she did the last season before the war. In 1913, according to the official report of Secretary Hughes, Germany produced 481,169,000 bushels of rye. In 1923, according to the same report, she produced 282,452,000 bushels of rye. So that Germany produced last year only 58 per cent as much rye as she produced the last season before the war. According to the official report of Secretary Hughes, in 1913 Germany produced 1,617,896,000 bushels of potatoes, and, according to the official report of Secretary Hughes, this production was 500,000,000 bushels less in 1923 than in 1913. According to the official report of Secretary Hughes, Germany in 1913 had 10,555,000 milch cows, well fed, healthy, and in good condition, producing large quantities of wholesome health-giving milk. According to the same report, in 1923 Germany had only 5,139,828 milch cows, and these cows, because Germany had no funds with which to import oil cake and other milk-producing cattle feed, were producing a very poor, unwholesome quality of milk. According to the official report of Secretary Hughes, Germany in 1913 slaughtered 3,820,300 head of hogs, while Germany in 1923 slaughtered only 1,307,221 head of hogs. According to the same report, Germany in 1913 slaughtered 118,789 head of oxen, while in 1923 she slaughtered only 44,585 head of oxen. In the official report of Secretary Hughes I find the following:

Germany even in pre-war days depended upon imports for a large portion of her supply of fats and oils. In 1913, 58 per cent of the fats and oils were produced in Germany from domestic animals, home-grown seeds, and certain imported seeds. In 1922 the home-grown production constituted only 49 per cent of the total supply.

Thus it will be observed from the official report which comes from our American representatives in Germany that that country is producing less than 50 per cent of the fats and oils necessary to supply the needs of her people, and if she only produced 80 per cent of her foodstuff before the war, in view of the decreased production of wheat, rye, and other foodstuffs, as shown by the official report from our State Department, it is only fair to assume that she is now producing less than 60 per cent of enough cereals to sustain life among her people. She has no resources. Her money is of no value. She has no credit, and it is perfectly evident that unless America goes to her rescue more than 25,000,000 of her people must actually starve and die of hunger. Is it possible that free America in this alleged age of civilization will stand sullenly by and see this tragedy come without an effort to prevent it?

One of the conspicuous figures of the World War was Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen, of the American Expeditionary Forces. After the war was over General Allen was placed in command of the American forces left in Germany. His chivalry and patriotism during the World War, his high character, and unquestioned loyalty to our country justify great faith in his statements. While testifying on February 6 before the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House regarding the necessity for relief in Germany General Allen said:

The highest peak need will come at the end of March and early in April. Between that period and the next harvest it is predicted that over 20,000,000 people will be utterly dependent upon outside charity. The most essential foodstuffs and those which Germany herself is unable to provide are fats, cereals, milk, and cod-liver oil, all of which are now reported almost unobtainable for children.

Other witnesses before the committee testified to the same effect. I think Secretary Hoover, while describing the deplorable conditions over there, made a statement to the effect that unless the Ruhr situation is adjusted, 20,000,000 people will be out of food by the middle of April.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ANDREW. When did Mr. Hoover make the statement that in April there will be 20,000,000 people without any food? I can not find it in the record. Did he say that by April 1 there would be no food at all? The statement in the record by Mr. Hoover is that by the 1st of July the situation will be clear.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I heard Mr. Hoover's testimony before the committee. His testimony has been revised, and I am unable to say at this moment how much of the facts presented to the committee has been eliminated.

In discussing the distressing effect of the depreciation of the mark, General Allen said:

Owing to the depreciation in value of the mark, the farmers have bought little or none of the oil cake and other imported food and forage supplies for milk cattle. The cows, fewer in number than before the war, produce much less milk and of a lower butter-fat content and presumably lower also in other vitamin elements. There is a reduction to one-sixth and one-eighth commonly, and in some instances to one-twentieth of the milk formerly taken daily in the cities now brought in, and of this sometimes one-sixth is not sold because of the rise in price and inability to purchase.

It is well known that the compensation in marks received by workmen is not sufficient to buy the food necessary to keep themselves and their families from suffering from hunger. In addition to this, there is much unemployment in Germany. General Allen, in his statement before the Foreign Affairs Committee on February 6, said:

Unemployment is intensifying the distress. The latest figures of the German ministry of labor indicate that in December there were about 3,500,000 totally unemployed persons and an equal number on part time. Several municipalities have reported that the number of destitutes is more than one-half of the population.

When 3,500,000 workmen are out of employment and thereby deprived even of the paltry wages which workmen receive in Germany, think of the countless dependent women who must go hungry and the millions of little children who must cry for bread. General Allen further states:

Among children of school age the crisis is such that there is lack of breakfast and often of lunch for these children. There is also lack of shoes and stockings, underclothes, and winter coats, and undersled, pallid, listless, thin children seem but the natural result. Also among these children there is a prevalence of tuberculosis not known to school physicians heretofore. Up to 20 per cent of the children applying at 6 years for admission to schools have to be sent home as unfit to attend. School hours are from 8 to 1 o'clock with no afternoon session. The temperature of classrooms can rarely be kept up to 60° Fahrenheit. Meat once a week, no milk, bread with margarine or vegetable fat, potatoes, turnips, and meal soup constitute the most liberal diet of the average school child.

Think of frail, weak, undernourished, starved children trying to study in a room where the temperature is below 60. How would you like to try it, healthy and well nourished as you are? How would you like for your children to study while chilled and shivering with cold and while weak from the pangs of hunger?

General Allen further states:

It has been shown by investigations of our committee that 2,000,000 German children are slowly starving, and that an appalling increase in disease and death will result unless outside aid is provided. Our committee's conclusion, based on the recommendations of Doctors Emerson and Patterson and other credible persons, is that such sums be raised in the United States as will permit a supplementary feeding and additional clothing for approximately 2,000,000 school children and at least 500,000 younger children for at least six months.

Our American ambassador at Berlin, in a report to the State Department a little more than a year ago, made the following statement:

In large areas of Berlin more than 50 per cent of the children are tubercular. They are weak from undernourishment. There is less than 50 per cent of the amount of milk necessary to supply their needs, and they are entirely without fuel with which to warm the homes in which they live.

Imagine, if you can, a mother with helpless, hungry babies suffering from tuberculosis in a home where the fire is never kindled while the cold chill of winter is on.

Much propaganda has been circulated to the effect that the farmers in Germany have an abundance of food but that they are withholding same and refusing to sell to the cities for the worthless mark, and the impression prevails in some quarters that this food if distributed would suffice to meet the entire needs of the people of Germany. The data which I have given utterly explodes the fallacy of this contention. General Allen, in his statement relative to the attitude of the farmers in Germany, made the following statement:

The farmers have taken charge of 850,000 children from the cities, in addition to that they have been sending 40,000 tons of food a month to the industrial centers and places where food is especially short; so that the story is not true in regard to the farmers not doing their share. Of course, they will not dispose of their products for those worthless ordinary marks.

There are those who would harbor the malice and prejudice of war and would visit their hatred and revenge upon the babes unborn during the conflict, but such a course does violence to the ideals and charity of free America. America, which has fed the yellow-skinned coolies of China, the brown-skinned natives of India, and who would feed the negroes of Africa if they were starving—surely America would not see millions of white babies die in Germany. Where are our churches, where is our religion, that such an awful tragedy can continue? As bearing upon this question General Allen said:

But, as a peace treaty has been made with Germany there should be no desire to continue hostility toward the German people, especially the children and the newly created constitutional government in that country. They are a virile people who have contributed to the progress of civilization, and the world, it seems to me, needs them with their strength restored. Moreover, owing to the instability of international friendships, this gesture of humanity, such as the people of the United States are now showing, should prove a valuable asset for our Government in its future international relations.

There appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in support of this relief measure Mrs. Theodore Spiering, a social worker in New York City who went abroad with the intention of seeing and hearing for herself. She stayed in Germany for 18 months and visited hospitals, schools, and homes. Fresh from the awful tragedy she appeared before the committee and said:

I will tell you what I saw. I went to the Childrens' Hospital, in Karlsruhe, and whereas some time before the war tuberculosis was not known among the infants in Germany, I saw rows of tubercular infants in little cribs on balconies. They had tubercular children of all ages. I saw cases of rickets. The limbs of these children were greatly contorted and their stomachs were distended. They did not look like children at all, except for their faces. They looked more like some freak creation. The most ghastly thing which I saw—and I doubt if any gentleman in this room, no matter how stout, could have viewed that spectacle without horror—was the skeleton children. Their skin is laid over bones. There is not one inch of flesh, muscle, or fat on their little frames. One can scarcely imagine that they are living.

Rev. H. A. Dooley, of St. Louis, appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee and read a statement prepared by Father Lubeley, rector of the Holy Trinity Church of St. Louis, who recently returned from Germany. Father Lubeley said in part:

There are six or seven millions of children in Germany who are suffering actual want and hunger. A large percentage of these children are either threatened with or have already contracted tuberculosis, rachitis, and other afflictions incident to undernourishment. They are poorly clad and shod. I have seen hundreds of boys who had no shirts or underwear, covering their naked bodies only with a torn coat. In several schools that I visited in Munich, Darmstadt, Frankfurt on the Main, Hanover, and other cities, I found that 50 per cent of the children had come without breakfast. The majority had only one meal a day, consisting of potatoes, turnips, and coarse bread. There is an appalling shortage of milk in all large cities. The supply is not sufficient for even the smallest and most needy infants.

One of the saddest features is the plight of expectant mothers. Thousands of them are aware that they must enter the shadow of the valley of death without any of the loving ministrations that have been made impossible by the existing conditions.

Can it be possible that liberty-loving America, known for her charity and her love of mankind, could sit idly by with a surplus of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat and a surplus of other food commodities and see these millions of helpless men, women, and children in Germany die of hunger? If the American public only knew the real conditions over there, the demand upon Congress would come so strong that we would not hesitate at $10,000,000 but would appropriate $70,000,000 or more without faltering.

The American Friend Service Committee, of which General Allen is the chairman, before undertaking its relief work, selected two able, disinterested men, one of them Prof. Ernest M. Patterson, of the University of Pennsylvania, and the other Prof. Haven Emerson, of the department of public health of Columbia University. These great scientists, wholly disinterested, made a trip to Germany to study conditions there in order that the committee might have a first-hand report from impartial sources as to the extent of hunger and starvation over there. Both of these men submitted reports to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in support of this resolution for relief in Germany, and they have both sustained to the fullest extent the facts which I have presented from the testimony of other witnesses.

A striking and outstanding figure who appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee in support of congressional relief for the starving women and children in Germany was Dr. Wilbur K. Thomas, secretary American Quaker Service Committee, an organization which has charge of the marvelous charity work which has been and is being done in Europe by the Quakers of the United States. Doctor Thomas, testifying on February 6, 1924, stated that they bought their food in the United States; that on that date they were feeding 625,000 children in Germany; that this number would be increased to a million in a short time, and he stated that there was need for much more than that. Doctor Thomas stated further:

As to the food that we are serving, we are feeding at the present one meal per day, which costs 47 cents per month per child.

Think of buying food in the United States at American prices, shipping it to Germany, and feeding each child food valued at 1½ cents per day, and yet Doctor Thomas states that this small quantity when taken in addition to the limited amount of food which the children are able to procure in Germany is enough to sustain life. Doctor Thomas states:

About 1,400 calories is what a child who is 14 years of age needs. In our previous feeding we gave 667 calories a day to a child. Just now the amount is about 500 calories a day. The ingredients are flour, sugar, cocoa, fats, vegetable compounds, corn grits.

To show you how desperate the situation is I will quote further from Doctor Thomas:

Most of the feeding is done through schools, but we are feeding other children in hospitals and homes, selecting those suffering the most. We try to concentrate on the children that give the most promise of recovery. It is hard-hearted to do that, but when you have one-tenth enough you have to discriminate some place. It is a question of keeping those threatened with tuberculosis from contracting it.

It is hardly conceivable that such a condition could exist in a civilized world. We in America are prone to boast of our charity and love for humanity, while there are others among us who are constantly talking of brotherly love for mankind. It is inconceivable to think that such a condition could exist among the women and children in Germany while we have in this country a surplus of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat which will be left over after everyone has been fed; and while we have great quantities of eggs, milk, butter, and meats of all kinds.

Think of this land of plenty and then try, if you can, to realize that the American Quaker Relief Association, now working in Germany, is compelled to do the hard-hearted thing of trying to save the children who are threatened with tuberculosis while permitting the unfortunate ones who are afflicted to starve and die in their awful affliction without giving food to them, because these Quakers who are trying to administer to the needs of those suffering people have not sufficient food to go around.

Doctor Thomas further states:

Referring to the schools in Germany, they have discontinued the afternoon sessions. The figures from one district may be of interest to you. Falkenstein, in Saxony, had 2,200 school children in November, 1923. Of that number, 1,351 were in need of extra food, as they did not have enough at home; 1,500 had not sufficient clothes; 1,000 were without sufficient shoes. Grown persons can be starved almost to the point of starvation, and then if given proper food they can be brought back to normal; but if you starve children you permanently injure them.

Doctor Thomas made the further statement relative to the extent of the distress in Germany:

The information I have was gathered from Mr. Hoover's figures, from the American Ambassador's figures in Germany, and from our own people. These indicated that approximately one-third of the total population of Germany are in need of help.

When you add to this statement the testimony of General Allen that the highest peak need will come at the end of March and early in April; that between that period and the next harvest it is predicted that over 20,000,000 people will be utterly dependent upon outside charity; when you consider evidence such as this, you have abundant proof that this relief bill, as a temporary measure, ought to be enacted immediately.

If General Allen's committee succeeds in raising five or six million dollars, this sum, in addition to $10,000,000 provided in this bill, will give considerable temporary relief. If the Dawes Commission should succeed in inducing the French to release the spiteful death grip which they hold upon Germany, then when the raw materials become available and the people are able to work, as they will be when the Ruhr is evacuated and the nation is given credit with which to buy food, in that event this temporary relief may be sufficient. At any rate, the situation is desperate, and this bill ought to be enacted, and enacted at once.

Another most impressive witness, wholly disinterested, who appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, was James H. Causey, an investment banker of Denver, Colo., who recently returned from Germany. Mr. Causey states that he went into the Ruhr last fall. In his description of conditions he said:

Awakening very early in the morning on just such a day as this (a cold, freezing day, February 6) only with a driving rain, I saw outside of my hotel a long, almost countless, line of women and children waiting in the rain. I asked the porter in the hotel what it was all about, and he said they were women and children waiting to buy potatoes. I went out, understanding no German. I counted that line of people and found 2,200 people at 8 o'clock in the morning, and the porter said they had begun at 3.30 o'clock in the morning. I watched that line all day. It slowly moved, and late in the evening many were still there. I found they could buy only 1 pound of potatoes every other day for each member of the family.

Mr. Causey's interest and sympathy were aroused by this spectacle, and he began an investigation. He visited a hospital at Gelsenkirchen. Describing conditions there, he said:

I saw little children, 120 in one hospital, suffering from tuberculosis, and bear in mind that tuberculosis among little children between the ages of 2 and 6 was not known in Germany before the war. It is simply due to malnutrition and absence of food. I saw little children, suffering from tuberculosis, screaming that day—that Sunday afternoon—a sight that I will not forget to my dying day. One little mother had a 4-months-old baby that weighed 7 pounds when born. I saw the chart over the bed, as in every German hospital. It weighed 9 pounds that day on her breast. The mother came 30 minutes every day to feed it from her breast to supplement the hospital feeding, and for three weeks at a time she could not get a single drop of milk. She had to feed the baby with warm tea. I went among other babies and nurses in the hospital, and I am satisfied that children of Gelsenkirchen and Essen were literally starving to death, and babies that were not born during the war.

Mr. Causey said further:

The good that I think America would do by way of this relief would be beyond all the millions that this committee could possibly give, whatever you appropriate. It would be a matter of good will to starving children, who were not born during the war, who are this moment dying. I think how they shivered in the cold in October, November, and December, and think of a day like this in the Ruhr among the little children who have not the necessary food for cold weather. There is suffering in an industrial civilized community such as was never known before.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Other people have control of the transportation, have they not?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. How will we get these provisions into the Ruhr if we appropriate this money?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Causey, a banker of Denver, who was over there two or three months last fall, said in his testimony before the committee that Americans have no trouble in getting into the Ruhr. He has been buying and bringing carloads of supplies in there at his own expense from Holland.

Mr. RAKER. We were advised last August or September that carloads of provisions were lost and were not usable when they got there because those who had control of transportation held them until they spoiled.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I have read testimony to the same effect as the gentleman states, but the food which will be bought by the money which we are to-day appropriating will be under the control and will be distributed by American representatives.

Mr. Causey testified that the job of feeding the hungry women and children of Germany is entirely too big for any private subscription. He says that there is starvation there now and that immediate relief is necessary. Upon this point he said:

The distress is immediate. It is there now. I saw two old women going into a feeding station so weak they could not carry the bucket of food they could get. A little boy was trying to take a bucket home, but he was too weak to carry it to his young starving brothers and sisters. The need is now.

If there is love for humanity, if there is charity, if there is Christianity left in America, this tragedy among the helpless of our fallen foe can not continue. We pledged our faith to the people of Germany when we entered the war. Our President declared, "We have no quarrel with the German people; we have no feeling for them but a feeling of sympathy and friendship; we are glad to fight for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German people included." If America was sincere in that statement, if by her deeds she will fulfill her pledge, then starvation among the helpless in Germany must cease. I can not believe that America with 100,000,000 bushels of surplus cereals for which she has no market, with an abundance of meats, milk, butter, and eggs, will stand sullenly by and see 25,000,000 people, most of them helpless women and innocent children, perish from hunger, cold, and disease without helping them. I know that if the great mass of the people in this country were permitted to know of the awful tragedy that is being enacted over there they would arise in mass and demand that instant relief be extended, and I sincerely hope that the time may soon come when America will know how awful the tragedy is.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the Chair shall recognize some member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was about to explain that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is obliged to leave the room, and he told me to control the time in his absence. I will yield to myself five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I have no contest with any gentleman who tells us about the prevailing conditions in Germany, and particularly in the Ruhr, so far as the women and children are concerned. The pamphlet which I hold in my hand contains a report of the hearings and affords evidence which no one can put aside. The fact of suffering is undisputed. It has come mainly since France went into the Ruhr; and that adventure of France has not met, so far as I know, with any serious opposition from the United States. And if you appropriate now, then next year, in the event France maintains her occupancy of the Ruhr, you will be asked to appropriate again. And if Congress appropriates now for the relief of people who are undoubtedly suffering in Germany, where is its charity to stop? Certainly not with Germany. The world has passed through a great cataclysm and been subjected to such an ordeal of loss and waste and wreckage as never occurred before. If there is a contribution out of the Public Treasury for the relief of Germans, on what basis can there be refusal to contribute out of the Treasury for the relief of the Japanese, who are certainly, many of them, in dire straits now? How are we going to turn away from the Chinese, millions of whom are in danger of starvation and of disease consequent upon it? How are we to turn away from the people of the Near East, Greece, and the other States in the Balkans; from the people of Asia Minor, where the great tragedy at Smyrna illustrates what has transpired there and its awful results? There can be no limit to public charitable contributions, and no satisfactory explanation will be found in the fact that incidentally there may be a purchase of farm products involved. The cold fact must be faced that the public funds placed by our action in the Treasury are to be expended for the benefit of those across the water.

There is suffering, extreme suffering, and that suffering should be relieved; how? There has been much talk about the heart of the United States; and I hope the heart of our country is still true and loyal to the highest aspirations, in spite of circumstances which sometimes discourage that belief. What is in the heart of the country should have been made manifest by the administration appointing a member of the Reparation Commission two years ago, when such men as Norman Davis recommended it, not contenting itself with casual observers having no official connection at all with the Reparation Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No man can rise here and say that the pulses of the administration have been quickened by reports of suffering in Germany or elsewhere to the extent of attempting effective action. And yet some of us who stand here from a sense of duty to oppose this measure are talked about as conscious wrongdoers. Some one even spoke of Pontius Pilate as illustrating, in a way, the position which we occupy; and another said we are repudiating the teachings of Christ Himself by the position which we occupy. With all of our reverence for the noblest code of ethics the world has known or ever will know, and for the God Man who gave it to the world, what should we do? Surely we are not taught that it is our right and duty to thrust our hands ruthlessly into the Treasury and withdraw the money of the people and send it across the water.

It is rather a disagreeable task for me to rise here and oppose this measure. It is a rather unprofitable task in view of the fact that it is a foregone conclusion that the measure will be passed by the House. I wish to say it is not any lack of sympathy which compels me to do this. I for one, after I heard the evidence submitted to the committee, gave and gave until it hurt, because I have no prejudice against the women and children of Germany.

I have no prejudice against the people at large in Germany. My undying prejudice is against the little coterie that brought on the World War and disordered all of the conditions of the world and produced so much suffering. I am not restrained, therefore, by any prejudice, because I have done all I could as an individual. It is our own money we should use instead of the public money in order to express our sympathy.

The very way to prevent people from contributing privately is to point them to the fact that Congress has taken charge of the business of giving charity; that Congress is doing it and, therefore, they can fold their arms and decline to aid. The surest method of thwarting the purpose of General Allen and his associates to raise funds by private action is to pass this measure and inspire the belief that the Government is always going to do things of this sort, and that those of means, who are amply able to do it, should stand back and look to Government initiation and action.

In my opinion the measure is inexpedient and wrong, whatever the Constitution may be and however the Constitution may be construed. It is hardly worth while, gentlemen, to talk here about the Constitution. It is often discussed here, and the discussion is usually regarded with indifference. You may see in the British Museum, as I have seen, the original of the Magna Charta. It has become a mass of pulp, so that not one line is legible, not even the signatures; some of the seals of the lords who signed it remain, but that is all, and in a figurative way, just as in a physical way, so far as the Magna Charta is concerned, our Constitution bids fair to become here an unread and illegible thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Virginia two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. RATHBONE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certainly I will yield.

Mr. RATHBONE. As an eminent lawyer, would you not agree that contemporaneous construction, or nearly so, is one of the very best tests of what was constitutional or not, and if the fathers of this Republic—

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I catch the gentleman's question. I am afraid of his rhetoric, but I have gotten his question. His thought is that because something has been done once it may be properly done again.

Mr. RATHBONE. Many times.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The Supreme Court has never passed upon the matter, and we are charged with a heavier responsibility for the reason that it is difficult if not impossible to invoke the court's jurisdiction. My distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] talked about precedent, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RATHBONE] has just mentioned precedent. The use of precedent has not infrequently destroyed in some cases and in other cases has threatened the destruction of institutions. Let me read the language of Junius in the preface to his Letters, which sounded a cry of alarm to England in a time of corruption, but put hope in the breasts of the English people. Warning against the unconsidered regard for precedent, he said:

One precedent creates another. They soon accumulate and constitute law. What yesterday was fact to-day is doctrine. Examples are supposed to justify the most dangerous measures, and when they do not suit exactly, the defect is supplied by analogy.

Precedent is now glorified and tortured as well for the purpose of supporting the argument in support of this measure. We are told about the $100,000,000 which was sent across at the request of Mr. Wilson; but that was a proper exercise of the war power, the war not then having terminated. Many of the other precedents cited are liable to as much criticism in respect of their real application as that one is. [Applause.]

Then, there was something said about the Russian relief bill. Many of us opposed that bill as we oppose this, but yet as to the Russian relief measure it might have been contended that the action of the Congress followed so closely upon the termination of the war that it was perhaps justified. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].

[Mr. FAIRCHILD was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I am for this resolution. I am heartily for it. I am for it because of the evidence that was presented before the Foreign Affairs Committee as to the terrible suffering among the women and children in Germany, and I am for it because in my conscience I believe that we are acting well within the authority of the Constitution. You have heard quite a little regarding the suffering in Germany. I wish every Member of the House and every member of this committee could have heard the testimony of General Allen and of the witnesses who appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee. I wish every House Member had the opportunity to read all the testimony. I am going to quote from one witness, Mr. James H. Causey, of Denver, Colo., and I first want to quote from his opening statement, where he says:

I went over to Europe in June, 1923, with the chancellor of the University of Denver, of which I am a trustee, because I had been very much interested in the matter of international good will and gave some property which I owned in Denver to the university as a foundation for that purpose. We went over to talk with some of the university men of England and France to see what we could do about bringing students to our university and sending some of our students over there. That was my background. I spent a few days in Berlin and saw some food queues in that city and went with a pastor and visited two or three of the homes in the poor part of Berlin. I got the idea that I was being shown the same kind of poverty that I would see in Chicago, Washington, or Denver, and did not accept some other invitations to go into other homes, because I had that idea in my mind. Then I went down into the Ruhr, as one would go out of curiosity to visit the zoological garden in Washington, for example, and from my first day I saw a sight that I shall never forget as long as I live, which altered the whole course of my trip to Europe.

Then Mr. Causey describes what he saw in the Ruhr and going through Germany and through the industrial centers, all of which vividly enforced his statement when he said:

From my first day I saw a sight that I shall never forget as long as I live, which altered the whole course of my trip to Europe.

This Denver banker, this member of a Colorado university, over in Europe, when he saw the suffering among the women and children of Germany, abandoned all his business and all the purposes of his trip, and from that day to the day he appeared before the committee he has been working to bring relief to these suffering German women and children. Oh, I thank God there are such men in the world, and I thank God that such men come from America. And what does he say about the suffering?

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? I want to call attention to the fact that Mr. Causey's wife died while he was in Germany. He had written her about his works and her own heart was so engaged in it that, although she knew she was stricken with a fatal malady, she did not tell him of her illness, and asked her daughters in Denver not to tell him for fear that if he knew he would come back.

He never did know until after she was dead, and then at the urgent solicitation of his daughters he stayed on with a breaking heart to get his work further under way.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I am glad for the interruption so that that information can be given here.

Now, what did Mr. Causey say about the suffering? Time will permit only a brief quotation from the heartrending details given by him and other witnesses who appeared before our committee:

Mr. CAUSEY. May I speak about the suffering I saw? I went into the hospital at Gelsenkirchen. Everybody had been turned out of the city hospital excepting very little children, and if I should bring a picture to this committee of what I believe to be the typical condition of the children in the Ruhr there would not be a moment's hesitation about relief from America. I saw little children, 120 in one hospital, suffering from tuberculosis; and bear in mind that tuberculosis among little children between the ages of 2 and 6 was not known in Germany before the war. It is simply due to malnutrition and absence of food. I saw little children suffering from tuberculosis, screaming that day, that Sunday afternoon, a sight that I will not forget to my dying day. One little mother had a 4-month-old baby that weighed 7 pounds when born. I saw the chart over the bed, as in every German hospital. It weighed 6 pounds that day on her breast. The mother came 30 minutes every day to feed it from her breast to supplement the hospital feeding, and for three weeks at a time she could not get a single drop of milk. She had to feed the baby with warm tea. I went among other babies and nurses in the hospital and with the doctors in the hospital, and I am satisfied that children of Gelsenkirchen and Essen were literally starving to death, and babies that were not born during the war.

I myself went immediately to The Hague and sent down, through the Dutch Red Cross, two carloads of milk and essential medicines and rice and a few things of that kind. I went into schools where I was not expected, simply dropped in casually, had plenty of time, not as a tourist, as I had given up sailing home, and I saw children in the various schoolrooms. They would call them up, and I said, "What is the age of this child?" I saw this in more than one school building, and I saw children who, as they would come up, I would say, "What is the age?" I figured the children's ages in these various schools from the standpoint of undernourishment, and in many cases my guess was half their real ages. I saw one woman actually fainting in the street from hunger. I saw long lines of people waiting for food. The condition of suffering and hunger among children and women in and out of hospitals and feeding stations is such as you would not imagine could exist in a civilized industrial district just a few miles from Holland.

Now permit me to quote from another witness, Dr. Wilbur K. Thomas, secretary of American Friends Service Committee, where he says:

You have heard something about the worst cases. You would not know that anything was the matter with the great mass of children, however, unless you examined their general condition, height, weight, etc. Then you would find they are 2 to 10 inches under height and 5 to 20 pounds under weight. If you saw them playing about on the streets you would say they are fairly normal children until you began to compare them with normal children, then you would begin to realize the terrible conditions that exist. I do not wish to dwell upon the unusual cases of deformed children and tubercular patients in hospitals. I wish to refer, however, to some conditions that are brought out more fully in Doctor Emerson's report, copy of which I desire to leave with you. Doctor Emerson refers particularly to the large increase of pulmonary tuberculosis among babies under 6 months of age. Such conditions are almost unknown to medical science in our generation. I do not speak, therefore, of an unusual class of hospital patients or the deformed or dwarfed, but of that great mass of children under height and under weight, who, unless they get food that will make them strong before the age of puberty, will be permanently dwarfed in mind and body. It is that group of children for whom I especially plead.

There were a number of witnesses who all gave similar testimony, including General Allen, whose first observation of the distressing conditions was while he commanded the American Army of occupation. Among other things he said:

From 1 to 2½ per cent of school children in some districts are found to have open pulmonary tuberculosis. Crippling rickets, bone and joint and gland tuberculosis are common, and there is much skin infection among school children. Scurvy is less common but increasing. A form of ulceration of the eye easily leading to blindness unless quickly recognized, but speedily curable with fresh milk and suitable diet, is noticeable.

The weakness of children from hunger is a common cause of fainting, dizziness, headache, and inability to study, and inability to pay attention simply because of hunger. The record of collapse cases in the schoolrooms was never before known to be so great as now.

The extent of undernourishment in the schoolroom is best expressed by the fact that practically everywhere there is a discrepancy of almost two years between the age, the height, and the weight of the children in contrast with the normal child.

In the face of these terrible heart-rending conditions we are told by some that we have no power under the Constitution to grant any relief. We are told that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution does not give us the power. We are told that no matter how much each of us in his conscience believes that in present world conditions the welfare of the United States will be served by affording relief to the starving women and children, yet there is no power.

The objection answers itself. When the broad power was granted by the Constitution to the United States Congress and to no other body to provide for the general welfare, the determination in each instance of what is for the general welfare rests of necessity only with Congress. Those who object to this joint resolution on constitutional grounds state that the question can not come before the United States Supreme Court in any way that can secure a determination that an act such as this is unconstitutional. That statement from the objectors is an admission that this appropriation is within the constitutional power of Congress. It is an admission that the power to determine what is or is not for the general welfare rests only with Congress.

For the United States Supreme Court to determine that an appropriation such as this is unconstitutional would be tantamount to the United States Supreme Court assuming to decide what is or what is not for the general welfare notwithstanding that the Constitution confers that power upon Congress.

Early in our history in 1803 Congress exercised the power to appropriate for humanitarian purposes, and again in 1804. In 1812 Congress appropriated $50,000 for the earthquake sufferers in Venezuela. During all the years from 1803 there have been numerous precedents, some 60 or 70. Thirteen precedents have been appropriations for needed relief in foreign lands, including Ireland in 1847, France and Germany in 1871, Ireland in 1890, India in 1897, French West Indies in 1902,

Jamaica in 1907, Italy in 1909 and China in 1911. My learned friend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Moore] quotes an eminent authority in England that precedents are detrimental. He overlooks the broad distinction between England where there is no written constitution and precedents create the only constitution they have, and this country with a written Constitution where precedents merely interpret.

Major General Allen in his testimony said that "owing to the instability of international friendships, this gesture of humanity, such as the people of the United States are now showing, should prove a valuable asset for our Government in its future international relations."

Is it not for the general welfare of the United States that we by our action to-day improve our future international relations with the spirit of good will that comes from a humanitarian act, even though the primary impulse is humanitarian and sympathy for helpless, starving, undernourished children?

Unity and good-fellowship between nations make for peace and are a preventive of future wars. As surely as our Saviour gave to mankind the new religion, the new gospel of brotherly love, so true it is that our forefathers in creating this Republic gave to the political relations between man that heavenly doctrine of brotherly love.

The starving women and children in Germany appeal for this proposed relief. The wealth of our Nation demands that it be given. Unity among the people of this country suggests favorable action. All the ideals and traditions of America are in accord with this proposed action.

The war is over. It was not fought against the women and children of Germany. It was fought against an autocracy that has ceased to exist. In its place has been born a new republic. The lovers of freedom in Germany have asserted themselves. Their women and children are suffering, starving, and dying. It is to them, to the little undernourished starving children born since the war, we wish to offer relief.

During the war in large numbers American boys of German blood and German ancestry went forward to fight the battle of our country against the Germans. In time of peace their desire should be the desire of all to succor these starving children. I speak for the doctrine of love and against the doctrine of hate. I speak for a unity in this country where people of many nations, including the Germans, tracing their ancestry back to the Revolutionary War and before have formed a new American race, a mighty people.

During all the years of American history the Germans who came to this country came as lovers of liberty, fleeing from oppression, and here they helped fight the battles of liberty that made and preserved this Nation. Such men as Carl Schurz and Franz Sigel were among the great generals who helped in the battles that saved the Union during the Civil War. In the Revolutionary War General Herckheimer, for whom Herkimer, N. Y., is named, with German troops arrived in time to fight and win the battle that prevented the British troops from Canada uniting with the British Army in the South, when a union of the British troops would have lost the Revolutionary War for America. He died of wounds received in that battle. Of him General Washington said he "served and gave his life to his country because he loved it and not because he desired preferment, fame, or riches."

General von Steuben will always live in the glorious pages of American history. In the darkest days of Valley Forge he gave his services to General Washington and organized the Continental troops into the fighting force that brought victory.

It was Friedrich August Mühlberg, the first Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, who was president of the Pennsylvania convention that ratified our Constitution.

Let us not forget American history. Let us not forget American traditions nor American ideals. Let this Congress in the interest of humanity and in the interest of the general welfare, international peace abroad, and unity at home extend a helping hand across the sea to do America's part toward saving the lives of the starving women and children in Germany.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the past I have called attention to the fact that when it came to dealing with peoples other than our own people we are always generous, but when it comes to dealing with our own people we are always tight with our money. I think the children and the women of Germany are in a very serious condition, and this appeals to the great American heart and to the charitable disposition of Americans, but I want to call your attention to another fact. You speak of tuberculosis among the children of Germany. There are American soldiers that were on the front that have tuberculosis in this country and they can not get a cent out of your Veterans' Bureau. [Applause.] They are here trying to get some help every day. I take the position that the United States Government is able to help Germany, but she ought to help her own people first or at least at the same time. I have no objection to your helping the people of Germany if you will help the people of your own country.

There are farmers in the United States who are in distress. I have received reports of the conditions of many farmers. I have introduced into this House a measure asking for a loan, not a gift, but a simple loan, of $1,000,000 to help destitute farmers in the State of Oklahoma who are to-day so poor that they offer to give half of their oat crop and will furnish the land and labor to grow it if they can get enough money to buy seed oats. Are you going to take the taxpayers' money of this country under these conditions and vote it out as a gift without helping Americans? No; gentlemen, here is the whole secret of this matter. Let us be honest and candid with one another. France has Germany by the throat and instead of the United States taking the stand she ought to take in foreign affairs we are going to pay money out of our Treasury to try to make good to the German people for failing to help her to get straightened out with France. The United States ought to say to France, "You must not pursue a policy that will starve the women and children of Germany. If you do you must pay us at once what you owe us."

We should take some strong stand in the affairs of the world, and then we would not have this condition that makes it necessary that you have to go into the Treasury and take this money out of it. This is simply trying to find a chance to get out of a hole that incompetent statesmen have gotten this country into in reference to its foreign affairs. If the thing had been handled properly at the right time this condition would never have arisen, and now you say, "We will take $10,000,000 of the taxpayers' money and give it to these people." No doubt the distress is great, and no doubt the situation is intense, but, gentlemen, I will say to you that the taxpayers of this country will call you to account, and you remember, when you do this, that there are soldiers in this country crying now for treatment, soldiers crying now for hospitalization, soldiers in the last stages of tuberculosis who can not get a single dollar out of the Veterans' Bureau, and you should remember that there are farmers and their families in this country that are in dire distress.

As evidence of the conditions of the very poor and unfortunate farmers of Oklahoma, I will submit to you for your consideration some excerpts from farm organizations in Oklahoma, as follows:

The farmers in this county are having to buy their feed and seed and are absolutely unable to get money or credit for same. Some are offering to give one-half of the oats and furnish the land and the labor for some one to furnish the money to buy the seed. Others are giving one-third just for the man furnishing the seed. Unless something is done immediately thousands of acres of good land will lay idle this year, which, if allowed to do so, will mean still harder times for Oklahoma. (From M. B. Eberhard, county president, and R. T. Conn, county secretary, Mays County Farmers' Union.)

A similar communication was received from C. G. Hetzel, president, and C. R. Jackson, secretary, Central Local No. 693, Farmers' Union, Pryor, Okla.

An indorsement of the resolution was received from Joseph L. Payne, secretary Farmers' Union No. 633, Mulhall, Okla.

Also a letter from L. G. Chriss, Tupelo, Okla., as follows:

In Coal County we now have 3 banks out of 11 banks that were here in 1920. The three banks have all of their own customers that they can take care of, and the balance of us that have been doing business with banks that have failed are unable to get any assistance to make this crop. In other words, we do not have sufficient banking facilities at this time. And, of course, the county has been hit so hard by boll weevil, drouth, floods, etc., that we are sure in a pitiful condition.

And W. O. Woods, secretary of Okfuskee County Farmers' Union, forwarded resolution favoring immediate relief.

Also, letter from W. H. Summers, of Ada, Okla., which states:

All wagon yards in Ada are filled up with old plows, wagons, horses, and mules, and I guess there have been 150 foreclosures this winter in Pontotoc County alone.

Also, letter from M. B. Williams, Fort Towson, Okla., which says:

There are 100 farmers in this township who would like to make a crop this year, but can not get any help. For myself, I have my land already to plant, but haven't any seed corn yet. I went to the bank yesterday and asked for a loan of $100 and they turned me down, saying my debts were too heavy. The Dallas Federal Reserve Bank closed our bank here, but they offered to release my stuff for that amount, but the banker said he could get all the loans he could carry from people who did not owe but small amounts, and there are a thousand farmers in the same fix I am in. I only owe $305.18, secured by two good mules, two good milch cows, two good yearlings, wagon and harness. My crop will consist of 15 acres of corn, 20 acres of cotton on good land, besides my truck patches.

This is the true conditions of many farmers in Oklahoma. It seems if the Government loans money to the big corporations they could loan we farmers a little until we could get out of this strain, for it is not our fault, but due to the drouth and boll weevil. We can go without clothes as far as the law will permit it, but we have to have a little food and feed to work a crop. We need help here in Choctaw County.

I do not know what the condition of other farmers in the United States is, but in Oklahoma I do know there are very many of them who need financial assistance despite the talk of some of their leaders that they do not need any more credit.

The credit will only give temporary relief, but it is absolutely necessary to have this temporary relief.

In answer to the statement that many of their conditions are due to their own fault and thrift, I want to say that the greatest cause of the conditions has been the season and ravages of the boll weevil.

The conditions in Germany are the result of the conduct and the fault of the leaders of the German people.

Gentlemen, in view of these conditions that exist in my State and the failure of the Congress up to this time to make any provision for them, I respectfully submit to you that it is not right, and that it violates the principle of Americanism to leave your own people in dire distress for lack of a little credit while with lavish hands you give the taxpayers' money to the citizens of a foreign Government. I believe in charity and think that the unfortunate people of Germany need immediate assistance, but I also believe that charity begins at home, and if the Congress will immediately pass a resolution granting relief to the poor and distressed farmers of the United States, then I am willing to immediately extend credit to the distressed people of Germany; but this action on the part of the Congress is merely for political effect and disregards the necessity of their own people.

An American citizen in his own country ought to have first consideration, and this Congress ought to at least extend him the right to survive the unfortunate financial conditions of which he is the victim and for which he is not responsible.

The Government is able to give the necessary assistance to the deserving and distressed people of the United States and at the same time extend this relief to the German people.

The thing I am complaining about is the failure of this Congress to take care of the meritorious and deserving people of this country before or at the time of the passage of this bill.

I do not believe in handing out the taxpayers' money to the people indiscriminately, or anything of that kind, but I do say that it is the duty of the lawmakers of this country to assist in the preservation of the wealth and resources of the country, and it is the duty of the Government to encourage every industry, and especially is it necessary to encourage agriculture, upon which the permanent prosperity and wealth of America depends.

This morning's Washington Post, of date Monday, March 24, 1924, carries the following headlines:

HALF BILLION RISE IN STEEL BUSINESS SHOWS PROSPERITY—BIG CORPORATION REPORTS GREAT EXPANSION DURING 1923—TOTAL, $1,571,414,463; PROFIT, $166,707,064—EMPLOYEES SHARE IN PROSPERITY; EARNED $5.58 A DAY AGAINST $4.91 IN 1922.

CHICAGO, March 23.—The United States Steel Corporation to-morrow will add its testimony to the record of American prosperity last year. The report is remarkable in showing how rapidly the steel industry recovered from depression and is illuminative when the complaints and forebodings of last summer are recalled.

With this industry showing such prosperity while the farmers of the country are going bankrupt is sufficient evidence to show that the present Congress and administration is satisfied to have prosperity in the great industrial centers of the country, due to special privileges granted under the tariff laws, while the cries of the toiling masses engaged in agricultural pursuits for a chance to survive are unheeded.

Gentlemen, if this Republic is to survive it must encourage and foster agricultural pursuits, educate its citizenship, and give to every man in America an opportunity to live and prosper in his own country by closing the doors to the undesirable immigrants who are seeking to rush in and imperil its prosperity and destroy its Government.

[Mr. McKeown was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the Record].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MacGREGOR].

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, the whole question before the House is whether we shall grant this immediate aid. The most of you believe in the Holy Scriptures, and the best argument is contained in the Scriptures:

When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then he shall sit upon the throne of his glory;

And before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.

And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left.

Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in;

Naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me.

Then shall the righteous answer him, saying, Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? thirsty and gave thee drink?

When saw we thee a stranger, and took thee in? or naked and clothed thee?

Or when saw we thee sick, or in prison, and came unto thee?

And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

The spirit of Christ is the guiding star of our Nation. The cry of helpless and starving children reaches us. Let us be true to our faith. Let us not hesitate in our ministrations unto those who are in distress. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Browne].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I would agree with my distinguished friend from Virginia [Mr. Moore] that the relief for Germany ought to be raised by private charity, but we have tried private charity, and it has been inadequate to cope with the terrible emergency. General Allen when he came home from the occupation of the Rhine started immediately a campaign to raise sufficient funds to take care of the destitution that he knew existed over in Germany. The Quaker society, a charitable organization, and one of the most efficient organizations, also attempted to relieve the suffering and destitution of Germany by private charity. Several millions of dollars have been raised through private charities, and millions of dollars in money and the necessities of life have been sent by American citizens having relatives over in Germany. These people came before the committee and proved that private charity was not sufficient to meet the great emergency that had arisen in Germany and to alleviate the suffering and the ultimate starvation of several millions of women and children. Germany tried to help herself. She had property and she went before the reparations committee and wanted to pledge her property and borrow $70,000,000 to relieve the great distress of her people, but the reparations commission, speaking through Poncalre, refused to authorize her to make the loan.

General Allen in January, 1924, appointed two experts with national reputations, Dr. Ernest Patterson and Dr. Haven Emerson, to make an intensive survey of conditions in Germany. Both of these men reported that 20,000,000 people in Germany were dependent on charity for their support, and that there were several million of little children who would die of starvation and tuberculosis and other diseases brought about by undernourishment unless immediate aid was provided.

Dr. Wilbur K. Thomas, secretary of the Quakers' service committee, also corroborated these other witnesses that came before the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which I am a member.

I will not restate what has already been stated as to the great destitution now existing in Germany, but I want to point out what it means if we do not grant relief at this time. It may mean the dissolution and the breaking down of the German Republic. If the German Republic is dissolved, what will we have in its place? The people will either go back to the old monarchists, the militaristic junker class, which will get control of Germany, or the communists will come into power, and we will have a communistic or soviet form of government instead of the young Republic that started over there so auspiciously with a constitution patterned after that of the United States. That will be the result unless we furnish some relief to Germany in this great emergency. Starving people do not reason calmly; they naturally lay their condition to their government. The monarchist and communist take advantage of the situation and are both seeking to overthrow the new Republic of Germany.

The stability of Europe concerns the United States. You can not have a stable Europe unless you have a stable Germany. I believe, as has been said, a great German Republic, standing there between Russia and the west, in the center of Europe, with the industrious, frugal, and liberty-loving people of Germany, will be a stabilizing influence all over the world. Therefore, we should support this resolution, not only because of the appeal that it makes to our sympathies, not only because of the great value that such an act of generosity will make in cementing the friendship between the peoples of the two nations, but for the further reason that the United States can not afford to see the overthrow of the German Republic and a great military autocracy or a soviet government take its place.

GERMANY OUR FRIEND.

Germany has always been friendly to the United States. President Adams said in a message to Congress, published in 1826:

In the infancy of their political existence under the influence of those principles of liberty and of right, so congenial to the cause for which we have fought and triumphed, they (the United States) were able to obtain the sanction of but one great and philosophic, although absolute, sovereign in Europe for their liberal and enlightened principles.

That sovereign was Frederick the Great.

Germany, under Frederick the Great, not only sympathized with the American Colonist, but also recognized the independence of the Colonies in concluding a treaty with the United States.

General von Steuben, an officer of high rank and ability under Frederick the Great, left his native land and a place high in the councils of his nation, leaving behind him his home, his friends, and the achievements of a lifetime, to help the colonists of America in their struggle for independence that seemed like a hopeless cause. Listen to his letters to Congress and to General Washington:

EXCERPT OF LETTER ADDRESSED TO THE CONTINENTAL CONGRESS BY GENERAL VON STEUBEN.

CONTINENTAL CONGRESS,

Portsmouth, December 6, 1777.

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: The honor of serving a respectable Nation engaged in the noble enterprise of defending its rights and liberty is the only motive that brought me over to this continent. I ask neither riches nor titles. I am come here from the remotest end of Germany at my own expense and have given up an honorable and lucrative rank. My only ambition is to serve you as a volunteer, to deserve the confidence of your general in chief, and to follow him in all his operations, as I have done during seven campaigns with the King of Prussia.

EXCERPT OF LETTER OF GENERAL VON STEUBEN TO GENERAL GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF THE AMERICAN ARMY.

DECEMBER 6, 1777.

SIR: The inclosed copy of a letter, the original of which I shall have the honor to present to Your Excellency, will inform you of the motives that brought me over to this land. I shall only add to it that the object of my greatest ambition is to render the country all the service in my power and to deserve the title of a citizen of America by fighting for the cause of your liberty. If the distinguished ranks in which I have served in Europe should be an obstacle, I had rather serve under Your Excellency as a volunteer than to be an object of discontent to such deserving officers as have already distinguished themselves among you. Such being the sentiments I have always professed, I dare hope that the respectable Congress of the United States of America will accept my services.

In the Civil War when the sympathies of many of the European nations were against us and some of them openly hostile and desirous of seeing our Nation torn to pieces by internal dissensions, Germany was our friend, and our German citizens wherever they were found were loyal to our flag and the Union.

I do not feel that the United States will be doing its duty if it does not render assistance to the German people in their hour of need. I have never felt satisfied that we did as much as we should to encourage the Russian Republic under Kerensky. The result of the breakdown of the Kerensky government was a victory for the communists and the triumph of the red flag, and for five or six years 140,000,000 people were practically without a government, and even now they are without a government that the United States is willing to recognize.

Do we want another republic overthrown and 65,000,000 more people thrown into chaos, or do we want to help them and help preserve the Republic of Germany, the young Republic that is struggling to get a foothold in Europe to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, this resolution has for its object the appropriation by Congress of the United States of $10,000,000 for the suffering women and children of Germany. I am opposed to the resolution for two reasons: I have been unable to find anywhere in the Constitution of the United States any power given to Congress to pass such a resolution, and, if it had the power, the resolution amounts to nothing and is a mockery under the name of charity. What is it? These suffering people ask for bread and you offer them a stone. The babies ask for milk and you give them vinegar. The report of the committee says there are 2,500,000 children starving in Germany, and they propose in this resolution $10,000,000 to save them. That amounts to $4 for each child, to last until the crops are harvested, which will be about six months. Four dollars per child for six months would amount to exactly 2½ cents per day. Two and one-fifth cents per day is the amount of charity which the eloquent gentlemen who have spoken here offer to these destitute women and children.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Along the line of the gentleman's argument, I believe it may be in order for him to offer an amendment to increase the appropriation.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; I might offer an amendment to include among the beneficiaries of the resolution 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 of Anglo-Saxon people who live in the Blue Ridge and Allegheny Mountains, extending from the Potomac to where they drop into the Tombigbee River in Alabama, people who are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh—pure Americans—whose children, many of them, and wives, many of them, are in as much need as the women and children of Germany. Gentlemen say in their report, "How any man can fight little children who are crying for bread is hard to understand." The eloquent gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] brought tears to my eyes in the exquisitely pathetic scene which he depicted to us with one of his little ones. He says he has three lovely children, but I also have children. I have six, and only one pair of twins. [Applause.] Have I, with six children, no heart for suffering children? The total inadequacy of this proposed appropriation—2½ cents a day—to save the lives of dying children shows on its face that that can not be its real object. This resolution should more properly be denominated not a resolution for the relief of the suffering babies of Germany, but a resolution for the consolidation of the German vote in America in the election this fall. [Applause.] Why do I say this? Because the amount you have put in the resolution is nothing, absolutely nothing, for accomplishing its nominal purpose. It would not preserve a baby's life for two hours. But I am opposed to the resolution because we have not the power to give it. My eloquent friends, Mr. BURTON, of Ohio, and Mr. RATHBONE, of Illinois, contend that we have the power to pass this resolution, first, under the general welfare clause, and, second, because we have passed similar resolutions in the years gone by. In five minutes a satisfactory discussion of that great question can not be accomplished, and, therefore, the argument can only be summarized.

Judge Story, in his great work on the Constitution, holds that the Congress has the power to appropriate money for any object for the general welfare of the whole people of the United States. Mark you, it must be for the general welfare; not special; not for a certain class, but general; and secondly, it must be for the people of the United States and not for foreigners. Mr. Pomeroy follows Judge Story—afar off. And against these two are arrayed the great names of Jefferson, Madison, Chief Justice Marshall, Justices Miller and James Wilson and Von Holst, Cooley, Curtis, Willoughby, Duer, Grover Cleveland, and Randolph Tucker. And surely the fact that we have done a similar thing before can not justify the passage of this resolution unless what was done before was rightly done. This question has never been decided by the courts, and therefore we have not that guide in our action. It will hardly be contended that if the first precedent and those following it were wrong, illegal, and unconstitutional that they would justify the passage of this resolution, unless it be admitted that the continued repetition of illegal acts can make that which is illegal legal. It may well be asked how long can a man continue in sin and in the repetition of wrongful acts before we recognize that from their continuance they must be right and proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER. This question, as I have said, has never been decided by the courts; therefore, we have a right to rely upon the preponderance and strength of those who oppose this view, and Judge Story distinctly states in his great work, Volume I, section 922 that it is not constitutional. I quote:

If the tax be not proposed for the common defense or general welfare, but for the other objects wholly extraneous—as, for instance, for propagating Mahometanism among the Turks, or giving aid and subsidies to a foreign nation, to build palaces for its kings, or erect monuments to its heroes—it would be wholly indefensible upon constitutional principles.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUCKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Did my friend hear the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], when he said that the Supreme Court recently decided that it can not decide the question?

Mr. TUCKER. I know what the gentleman was referring to.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Was not that a decision that it is for the conscience of this House and no other body to decide what is for the general welfare?

Mr. TUCKER. Oh, no. If my friend said that, he is mistaken. The court had before it a law which you gentlemen passed a few years ago, known as the maternity law—an unconstitutional law, in my opinion, if you will permit me to say so—they merely said they could not decide the question because they did not have jurisdiction of it.

Mr. RATHBONE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he had better not yield, because I have no more time to give him.

Mr. TUCKER. I accept my friend's suggestion. Now, if we have not the power to do this thing, why should the pathetic pictures of distress which have been detailed swerve us from our duty? We are trustees of the people for the money in the Treasury brought there from their pockets.

The deed of trust under which we are acting has been written for one hundred and thirty odd years. Our powers are specified in that deed—the Constitution. How can we surrender that trust duty for any purpose? Let me illustrate. The most pathetic pictures have been drawn here of the suffering and distress in Germany. I was in a certain bank awhile ago, and while there a poor woman came in with five emaciated children. There could be no mistake as you looked at them of their need for food and clothing. She met the cashier and pleaded with him for money, saying "I know you have a plenty of money here in this bank; can't you give me enough to save these starving children?" Suppose he had gone to the till and taken money out to give to the woman, would he have been justified? What would the depositors and stockholders of that bank have said? Did he do that? Oh, no. He went down into his own pocket, as did every officer in the bank, and gave freely to the distressed woman and her children. And that is the way we should meet this question, for we have no more right to take the money from the Treasury of the United States for these distressed children than that bank officer would have had the right to go into the till and rob the depositors of their money to carry out his act of charity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the resolution under consideration provides for the appropriation of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute grain, fats, milk, and other foodstuffs adapted to the relief of the distressed starving women and children of Germany. Certainly no greater appeal can possibly be made to the hearts and conscience of the American people, and I am for it. [Applause.]

There are many precedents for what we are proposing. We appropriated $100,000,000 for relief among the people of Belgium and France; $20,000,000 for the distressed of Russia; we appropriated 10,000,000 barrels of flour to relieve the hungry in the Balkan States, and have expended millions in Austria.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield with reference to that appropriation?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman does not mean to say that that came out of the Treasury. That was money appropriated that equitably belonged to the wheat farmers.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That was money appropriated out of the funds belonging to the Grain Corporation, which belongs to the United States, and I can not see any difference.

There are those who will claim that the resolution is unconstitutional. To this I reply that in my judgment it is absolutely constitutional under the welfare clause. We have often appropriated money to prosecute work in other lands for the protection of the health of our people and the crops of our country. Certainly with a country with which we have had such great commercial relations to help reestablish them so that they may become physically and mentally fitted for future work and for future generations is to the welfare of our country. There are times when Congress must be its own judge as to the constitutionality of certain measures. This is one of them, because I see no way anyone can test the constitutionality of this resolution after it has been passed, and I for one feel that such resolutions are constitutional under that clause.

It would perhaps appear strange to onlookers that the Congress of the United States should be considering the appropriation of $10,000,000 to benefit the starving women and children of Germany so soon after the great war in which so many of our men were engaged. Some will say, why does not Germany borrow money to relieve the starving and needy of Germany? To this I reply that on December 15, 1923, realizing the condition of her people, Germany addressed a communication to the Reparation Commission stating that the results of the last cereal harvest and the experience of the last few years show that Germany requires to import a further quantity of about one and a half million tons of bread cereals up to August, 1924, and asking the Reparation Commission to declare in principle that a three-year credit to an amount not exceeding $70,000,000 for the purchase of bread cereals and fats, in accordance with paragraph 2 of article 251 of the treaty of Versailles, be granted priority over Germany's reparation obligations.

To this certain objections were made with the consequence that the communication has never been acted upon, and Germany is thereby precluded from giving any security for a loan. Had we been a party to the commission we could possibly have influenced a favorable decision and allowed Germany to help herself.

We must recognize that in declaring war it was against the German Empire; and the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, distinctly announced in a message before Congress that we had no quarrel with the German people but with the German Empire. The German people, under the autocratic powers of the Emperor, had no chance, nor did they ever express themselves in favor of the war. After it had been declared, through tremendous propaganda and a desire for victory, the German people, like all patriotic citizens, were desirous of winning.

These very people, after America had entered the war, and after we were able to disseminate in their midst literature explaining the situation, brought on a revolution, deposed their rulers, and, as a great compliment to the Government of this Nation, established a republican form of government. To-day, owing to the exhaustion of resources of Germany, the breaking down of its financial system, the unemployment of its people, the lessened production of food, and the occupation of a large part of the country—Ruhr section—many of the citizens of Germany, especially the women and children, are starving and are crying aloud for help sufficient to sustain life.

Germany did not before the war produce more than 80 per cent of her necessary food supplies, depending upon imports for the balance, which have now broken down. The supply produced by Germany has greatly decreased since the war. In 1910 she produced 141,000,000 bushels of wheat, whereas in 1923 she produced but 103,000,000 bushels, or some 83 per cent less. The rye production in 1910 was 413,000,000 bushels, while in 1923 it was 282,000,000 bushels, a reduction of some 45 per cent. The production of potatoes has fallen off some 300,000,000 bushels. In 1913 there were 22,000,000 hogs in Germany, while in 1923 they had been reduced to 14,000,000. In 1913 Germany slaughtered 31,000 horses; in 1922, 41,000; and in 1923, 86,000. In 1913 they killed 113,000 oxen, while in 1923, so depleted have they become, they killed 44,000, or about one-third.

It will be seen that recently they have been compelled to kill off their stock for food. Realizing, as I have said, that they produced but 80 per cent before the war, we can readily see how difficult it is to feed the people with these great depreciations of production which confront them.

America has always been known for her generosity in time of need. Never in the history of our country have our people refused to help the starving people of other nations. We want the world to know that America can be brave, strong, and invincible in time of war; but in time of peace when there are starving women and children she "will not pass by on the other side," but will lend a helping hand, and can practice charity just as graciously, just as generously, as she can strenuously prosecute war.

If we look at it even from a mercenary standpoint, when we realize that for more than a hundred years Germany and her people have been our second-best customers for the products of the factory and the soil; that she has purchased from our people billions of dollars' worth of goods and has carried on with us a commerce second alone to that of Great Britain, we would be forced to grant this appropriation. What merchant prince is there who, having had trade relations with another merchant and finding his customer bankrupt and his wife and children starving for want of food, would not lend a helping hand?

Then, too, we must not forget that our country enjoys a German-American population of more than 7,000,000 of people and their descendants, all of whom have been an integral part of this great country of ours. They, too, have helped to fell and clear the forest, to extend the domains, and to fight the wars, as all other American citizens. They have been thrifty and earnest citizens and helped to build up the great wealth of America and to extend her prestige until she has become the foremost Nation of all the world.

Mr. Michael F. Girtan in his testimony before the committee tells of Jane Addams speaking of visiting families in Germany, taking clothing and food to them. She had been telling how she lauded, what she had to eat and drink; and a little girl 7½ years old snuggled up to her mother and said, "Mother, is it true that there are some places in the world that you can eat until you don't want to eat any more?" "The children, the biggest asset we have," said he, "are starving there."

I was impressed recently with an article I read, written by Dr. Frank Crane, in which he spoke of the children, that they were the great asset of every country, in that they were to rule the destinies in the years to come.

It is proposed that this money shall be expended in the purchase of cereals and fats in America to be shipped to Germany and there distributed by the American Friends Service Committee. The work that this organization has accomplished in feeding the starving people of Europe has been one of the most commendable things ever performed in the name of charity. When I was in Germany in 1920 I visited the American Friends Service. I was taken to several of the places where this society was feeding the children. I remember one place where there were about 300 children being fed. They were given a very substantial soup, with some meat, bread, and milk. This was but one meal a day intended as a supplement to the meals which they received at home. It was sad indeed to see how many of these children had rickets, the number who seemed to be on the verge of tuberculosis, and how thin and pale they were. It was also astonishing to see them brighten up and become playful and cheerful again after they had this meal. Truly they became real children again.

I was told that one would be surprised how quickly a child recovered from rickets if he had sufficient food for proper nourishment; that tuberculosis invaded the children at such a tender age, such as had never occurred in children of that age before. I visited the schools where trained doctors selected from the various classes the children which needed this additional nourishment, and there I beheld this same Quaker association giving them such meals as before described. This society, thinking the worst had passed, retired from Germany in July, 1922, leaving this supplemental feeding in the hands of a German society which represented all the charitable organizations of Germany—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish. Times have, however, become so much worse in Germany that it is absolutely necessary that this work be again taken up and prosecuted if we would alleviate the starving, suffering, and diseased conditions of the people.

I was much impressed in the hearings with the testimony given by Mr. James H. Causey, banker, of Denver, Colo. I was particularly impressed when I realized that Mr. Causey had been born in Baltimore, that he had been a schoolmate of mine at the old No. 1 Grammar School, now known as the Edgar Allan Poe School, because in Westminster burial ground, just opposite this school, is buried that illustrious poet, at the head of whose grave stands a beautiful marble monument erected by the school children of Baltimore. Mr.

Causey spent much time in Germany, especially in the Ruhr. In speaking of the suffering, he says:

Everybody had been turned out of the Gelsenkirchen City Hospital, excepting very little children, and if I should bring a picture to this committee of what I believe to be the typical condition of the children in the Ruhr, there would not be a moment's hesitation about relief from America. I saw little children, 120 in one hospital, suffering from tuberculosis, and bear in mind that tuberculosis among little children between the ages of 2 and 6 was not known in Germany before the war. I saw little children suffering from tuberculosis screaming that Sunday afternoon, a sight I shall not forget to my dying day. It is simply due to malnutrition and absence of food. One little mother had a 4-months-old baby that weighed 7 pounds when born. I saw the chart over the bed, which showed the baby then weighed 6 pounds. The mother came for 80 minutes every day to feed it from her breast to supplement the hospital feeding. I went among other babies and nurses in the hospital and am satisfied that children in Gelsenkirchen and Essen were literally starving to death.

Mr. Causey went on to tell how he proceeded to The Hague, bought two carloads of milk, medicines, and so forth, and sent down to these starving people; that in visiting schools he saw children whose ages he guessed to be from 2 to 3 years under what they really were from the standpoint of undernourishment; that he saw one woman actually faint in the street from hunger, and long lines of people waiting for food.

In the city of Essen, a city of 500,000 people, Mr. Causey said the only railroad station available was 2 miles from the center of the city to which all foodstuffs must come. In 1922, 170,000 liters of milk came daily, but while he was there but 60,000 came, much of it sour.

Mr. Causey said he could not possibly exaggerate the need of those little babies of the Ruhr who were not born during the war. He laid aside his banking business in Denver, gave up his family, and stayed there three months; he went to England to raise money and said the people could hardly believe what he told them. He asked the English people for $150,000 and they gave him $205,000; he further arranged an international food-credit loan of $500,000.

From the testimony of Doctor Thomas, secretary to the American Friends Service, one-third of the population of Germany is badly in need of help. He said many of the children have to be sent home from school because of being in a fainting condition.

This is perhaps sufficient as to the real conditions in Germany, which is borne out by every witness before our committee, including Gen. Henry T. Allen, of the American Committee for Relief of German Children; Dr. Wilbur K. Thomas, secretary to the American Friends Service Committee; Mr. Michael Girtlen, of Chicago; Baroness von Schoen, now of Washington; and many other witnesses, all of whom tell the same sad story of conditions in Germany.

I am not entirely resting my case, however, upon their testimony, but supplementing it by my personal observations when in Germany.

To-day 20,000,000 of people need help in Germany. Starvation and death stalk the country. Shall we not with our great abundance of food help them upon their feet? There are 100,000,000 bushels of cereal which has no market, and a great abundance of meat, milk, and eggs. For the purchase of these products this money will be used and sent for distribution in Germany. We will not alone be doing a great humanitarian act but we will at the same time be helping the farmers of our country by relieving them from their present financial straits through the purchase of their food products.

I have great faith in what our Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, recommends. It has been his great province to relieve just such conditions throughout the world. If there is any man in the world who knows what should be done under these conditions, it is certainly Mr. Secretary Herbert C. Hoover. He tells us that in October and early in November there was a complete breakdown of currency in Germany and consequently great difficulty in internal distribution and a slackening of imports. I asked Mr. Hoover the plain question, to wit:

Would it be asking too much for you to say how you feel in reference to this bill?

He replied:

I can only feel one way about children. I have engaged a very large part of my time and energies for 10 years in remedying famine and privation among European children as well as in major questions of food supply to some 23 different nations in Europe. I have felt that in the larger view the real hope of recovery in the world and rehabilitation of Europe lies in sustaining the children. I could not oppose but must support provision against the undernourishment of children anywhere. Our one hope is that the next generation will be better than this one, and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerated from undernourishment.

From what I have said there can be no doubt that this relief should be granted at once, so that it will become available while it is yet time. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that every Member be granted the privilege of extending his remarks in the Record for the next three days on this joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean everybody in the House or only the Members who speak?

Mr. FISH. I meant every Member of the House, but I withdraw the request. Will the gentleman from Texas use some of his time?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW], and I hope you will all listen to him.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I trust you will let me speak without interruption until I shall have finished, as I am to speak along a somewhat different line from that touched upon by other speakers. In the first place, there have been a number of speakers who alluded to Mr. Hoover's testimony and the implication has been that he had indorsed this measure. This measure differs from the bill for the relief of Russia which passed this House three years ago in several respects, and notably in that it is not supported either by the President or any Cabinet officer, and the bill for the Russian relief was presented to Congress by a special presidential message and had the support of the Department of State and the Department of Commerce. Mr. Hoover in the hearing quite naturally said that he hoped that "the next generation of children would be better off than the present generation," but he does not any time in the hearings indorse this measure. In fact, he discouraged it and said he would prefer to see this sum of $10,000,000 raised by private subscription. Now, I am opposed to this measure for two reasons. First, because the conditions prevailing in Germany, unfortunate as they are, have been, in my judgment, greatly misunderstood, as to their origin and as to their extent. Second, because the situation is certainly not beyond remedy by the German people themselves. In anything I may say I hope I shall not be accused of prejudice tainly not beyond remedy by the German people themselves. In Germany, and as a young man I studied in German universities for more than a year. I have tender recollections of those days, and pleasant relations with German acquaintances of pre-war times. I sympathize with the effort to relieve the distress in Germany by private charity, but I am opposed to the forceful levy upon American citizens by taxation for this purpose. Let me direct your attention first to the fact that there has not been in Germany any drought or crop failure or famine. The official German census shows that cattle, hogs, and sheep have all greatly increased during the past year. In the 10 months from December 1, 1922, to October 1, 1923, cattle had increased by 350,000, sheep by 500,000, and hogs by 2,500,000. There went recently to Germany the largest shipment of hogs the United States has ever made. According to Mr. Hoover's testimony before the committee the German bread grain crop was better in 1923 than in the preceding year, and as for the exports of edible fats from the United States to Germany he says they were greater by 30 per cent in the last six months of 1923 than they were during the similar period of 1922.

The major problem of large food imports—is being solved. Every month of continued imports into Germany diminishes the major problem between now and the next harvest.

Mr. Hoover says—

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. ANDREW. My time is limited, but I yield for a question.

Mr. KINDRED. How does the gentleman harmonize his statement with that of General Allen, who lived in Germany and knows her present conditions?

Mr. ANDREW. Those are the statements that Mr. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, gave in the hearings. I was in Germany last October and spent some time in the Ruhr. I visited every sizeable city in that region—Essen, Dusseldorf, Duisberg, Dortmund, Bochum, and many others. I went, as you would go, expecting to find on all sides evidence of suffering and distress. I found food in variety and abundance everywhere in the restaurants, which were crowded with people. I found music in most of them and a great popping of corks. The opera houses and theaters were packed. The stores were thronged, and what impressed me most of all was the vast amount of new building which was going on, great office buildings and stores and factories and immense new chimneys under construction. There was the great Rhein Herne Canal under construction, and on the outskirts of every city were great land-development projects, rows and rows of new dwellings going up. I have photographs of some of them here (exhibiting). I talked with many Germans of different walks in life, clerks in stores and banks, workmen on the street and in the beer halls. And the conclusion that I came to was this, that Germany was suffering not from a lack of food or wealth but from its maladministration or maldistribution. The country as a whole had more wealth than it ever had before.

The rank and file of the people were the victims of the most colossal fraud the world has known since the time of John Law. The rich had fattened themselves at the expense of their fellow citizens. You have no conception of what the effect upon the country is of the issue of millions and billions and trillions and quintillions of paper money; and that paper money was issued not only by the national government but by every state and by every corporation. In the Krupp plant, which I visited, I found that notes in denominations of 500,000,000 and a billion and a billion and a half were being issued. The same was true of Stinnes and Thyssen and scores of factories and mines and cokeries. Notes were being issued with authority of the German Government by these firms for the payment of their men. The issuance of this vast amount of paper money resulted in the suffering that exists to-day.

Mr. RATHBONE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREW. Yes.

Mr. RATHBONE. Granting that that is all true, are the starving children to be punished for it?

Mr. ANDREW. I think not. But I think the remedy is to be found in the resources which Germany herself has. [Applause.]

Now, I want to quote from the great German editor and writer, Maximilian Harden, who said in an interview published in the American Hebrew:

It is all very well for Herr Stresemann and others, before and since, to shout to America for help for starving Germany. Why should America help? Germany is literally crammed with food. Half of last year's harvest is still untouched, and the reason why the people in the towns are starving is because the farmers and the landlords are deliberately keeping back foodstuffs. If I were Mr. Hoover, I would not send a single bushel of grain until the stocks now in Germany were consumed.

But even if there were a lack of food—and I admit what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RATHBONE] has said, that there is suffering in Germany because the majority of the people have not the money to buy—if there were a lack of food in Germany, if they can not supply from their own farms the grains and fats that are necessary, why should they not use the abundant resources which Germany has elsewhere in the world? The situation is certainly capable of alleviation by the people of Germany without resort to our Government.

Only last week our papers carried extracts from the report of the committee of experts who under Reginald McKenna, formerly Chancellor of the Exchequer, have been investigating the amount of money which Germans have transferred abroad. It indicates that in the United States alone no less than $1,300,000,000 has been invested. This is what he says:

In the United States German deposits, according to present information, amount to $200,000,000 as regards accounts opened by firms obliged to keep visible credit. But to this figure must be added the $100,000,000 deposits made by Germans under the names of German friends or relatives, the $500,000,000 of the Stinnes enterprises in the United States, plus another $500,000,000 invested by various German manufacturers, thus reaching an estimated total of $1,300,000,000 in America alone.

All this is in addition to German holdings in other countries—England, Switzerland, Italy, Holland, Spain, the Scandinavian countries, South America, and the Orient.

It is a matter of record that during 1923 Germany bought copper and cotton in the United States to the enormous amount of over $50,000,000. During the first eight months of last year more copper and more cotton than was sold to any other country in the world was sold to Germany. Furthermore, correspondents and tourists in Switzerland and in Italy and in the French and Italian Riviera sent back from all of these resorts the same report.

The most expensive hotels and restaurants are crowded with Germans. They drive the most expensive automobiles. They buy the most expensive luxuries. Cablegrams from Berlin at New Year's published in hundreds of American newspapers, showed how Germany, while crying for help abroad, passed the most extravagant New Year since the pre-war days. The Berlin correspondent of the New York Times sent to his paper the following cable:

A canvass of the principal hotels indicates increase of New Year's business, with practically 100 per cent German patronage, for this New Year Berlin and Germany generally was denuded of foreigners.

The Hotel Adlon is sold out with 550 dinner places at $10 each, plus a 10 per cent obligatory tip, which merely covers the table d'hôte food, and no drinks. Champagne is the favorite beverage here, selling for around $5 for German and $6 to $8 for French champagne, many Germans frankly preferring the latter, despite the Ruhr and Rhineland occupation. Hugo Stinnes is already assured of 800 cash customers at his Esplanade Hotel, who pay a charge of 45 gold marks plus 10 per cent. The Bristol has between 600 and 700; the Kaiserhof, the Central, and the Excelsior are all booming. The Rheingold alone to-night holds 2,000 Germans who are not going thirsty.

Berlin's "Great White Way," the Kurfurstendamm, is lined for miles with resorts with elaborate facilities for spending. Everyone, from the lobster palaces and the "champagne only" emporiums to the beer halls holding several thousands, is jammed and overflowing.

There are, in other words, two Germanies to-day; the Germany of the rank and file of the people, and the Germany of the great industrial capitalists who have absorbed, in the course of the last year through this vast inflation, the larger proportion of the wealth of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will give the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. ANDREW. If the wealthy classes in Germany can afford these luxuries that I have referred to; if there is no shortage of crops; if there is no difficulty about the importing of food; if they have resources to the amount of $1,300,000,000 in this country; if they are able to import from this country the copper and cotton and other raw materials they need, why in the name of common sense should we make them a present of $10,000,000 at our taxpayers' expense? [Applause.]

Under authority to extend my remarks I want to append here an interview which I gave in Dusseldorf on October 9 last, and which was cabled to the New York Times. It portrays more in detail than I have been able this afternoon to present the conditions prevailing in the Ruhr at that time:

(Copyright, 1923, by the New York Times Co.)

(By wireless to the New York Times.)

DUSSELDORF, October 9.—Representative A. PIATT ANDREW, of Massachusetts, gave the representative of the New York Times to-day some of his impressions of German finance. Mr. ANDREW, before his election to the House, was an assistant professor of economics at Harvard and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

"No one can visit Germany to-day," said Mr. ANDREW, "without great sympathy for the rank and file of the German people, unwitting victims of one of the most colossal frauds the world has seen since the time of John Law. The period of feverish buying and spending through which Germany has been passing during the last year is, in many respects, not unlike that which occurred in Europe in 1720, and now, as then, the net result is a complete and chaotic redistribution of the country's wealth. Those who were shrewd and foresighted and who enjoyed governmental favor have absorbed the greater part of the wealth of the country. Some have grown immensely rich. The majority of the German people, however, have grown rapidly poorer."

FOUR BILLION MARKS FOR $7.

"I have paper money in denominations of fifty and a hundred million marks, amounting in all to over 4,000,000,000 of marks, which I purchased yesterday at the Dresdner Bank in Essen in exchange for seven American dollar bills. A few years ago these notes were worth $1,000,000,000. Next month they will probably be of no value at all. One curious thing about this paper money, which was paid me by one of the leading banks of the Ruhr, is that, although authorized by the German Government, it has been issued by factories, foundries, and mines of that district, such as Krupp's, Thyssen's, and the like, and issued without security of any kind and without any limitation of amount."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

"I visited the Krupp plant at Essen day before yesterday and was shown over a considerable part of it by one of the officials. I had expressed great wonder and admiration at the incredible variety of things manufactured in this single establishment, when the amiable Krupp official accompanying me added with evident pride:

"This is not all Krupp has produced. We even have our own printing presses and print money to pay the wages of the employees."

HOW GERMANY HAS STORED UP CAPITAL.

"That chance remark is the key to the situation in the Ruhr. What Krupp has been doing Thyssen has been doing, and all the other great industrial mining magnates in the Ruhr. It is indicated by the paper money issued by scores of Ruhr firms which I obtained at the Dresdner Bank. It is evidenced also by the scores of mines and cokeries and foundries which I saw in traveling through the Ruhr, which are producing nothing to-day, but in whose plant one sees vast new chimneys and factory walls rising in process of construction.

"In order to prevent Belgium and France from getting reparations the German industrialists in the Ruhr ceased to turn out merchandise, but have turned their employees into new construction work, into work adding to their capital. And to pay their employees during the long period when income has not been forthcoming they have, with the authority of the Government in Berlin, printed and issued fabulous quantities of unsound and unredeemable paper currency.

"This policy seems to have been followed not only in the Ruhr but throughout the length and breadth of Germany. The national Government has built, extended, or improved canals, railroads, and public works. The municipalities and other local governments have built schools and other public buildings. Great corporations have built new factories and large foundries, improved docks, constructed ships, erected immense apartment houses, stores, office buildings, and long rows of dwellings. On almost every street in German cities, and especially in industrial towns, one sees building operations going on.

UNEMPLOYED STAYED OFF BY PAPER.

"There has been no unemployment, no shutting down. The whole German people has been feverishly active adding to the country's capital, but not creating immediate income or produce that could be taxed, and the workers have been paid in currency that likewise could not be taxed for reparations, since it has little or no value beyond the German frontier. They have been paid in currency printed and issued without limit by their employers, irrespective of whether the employers were national and municipal governments or owners of factories, foundries, or mines.

"I shall not speak of the wisdom of this policy as a means of preventing or reducing reparations payments to the countries whose territory was devastated during the war. I speak only of its effect upon the German people. No one can measure the suffering and injustice this policy has wrought upon helpless and innocent groups of German citizens. The very Germans who were most loyal to their country during the war have suffered the utmost, for with the degradation of the currency every bond in Germany has been made worthless, including the bonds issued by the Government for the prosecution of the war. No purchasers of German war bonds can ever hope to get anything in return except worthless papers.

"SAFE" INVESTMENTS WIPED OUT.

"Ordinarily, Government and municipal bonds are considered the safest form of investment and are purchased by trustees of hospitals, schools, and charitable institutions, by widows and people who on account of age, ill health, or other circumstances have retired from active affairs. The value of all such investments in Germany is to-day wiped out, and the institutions and people who held them are left penniless. By the same token the vast aggregate of deposits in savings banks of working people and others in humble circumstances have also been shorn of all their value.

"As wages have not been raised in proportion to the falling value of the currency, the working people generally find themselves not only confronted by the annihilation of all that they have ever saved, but also by a fabulously mounting price level to which their wages are very slowly and inadequately adjusted. Car fare or a newspaper to-day costs 10,000,000 marks, and everything else in proportion. In a fortnight they will probably cost twice as much, but wages are readjusted only once a fortnight or perhaps a month, and then but partially.

"What is true of the wage earner is even more true of salaried men and women; clerks in offices, banks, and stores; teachers in schools and universities; clergymen; and Government officials. Their pay, being for longer periods, is still more tardily read-justed, and their wage is still further behind in the dizzy upward flight. The collapse of the value of money has brought them not merely hardships, but humiliating poverty and often abject misery.

WEALTH IN THE HANDS OF THE FEW.

"On the other hand, what the many have lost the few have gained. By so much as some have been made poor, others have been made rich. For the real wealth of Germany remains to-day all that it was before. In fact, it has been steadily increasing through additions to the country's capital in new buildings and construction, which have gone hand in hand with the country's diminished consumption. The old factories, foundries, and mines, ships, and docks, office buildings, and stores, mills, and farms are still there, and somewhat larger than before. Only their ownership has changed. Their owners are no longer encumbered with mortgages, bonds, or promissory notes, for with the depreciation of the currency all debts have been wiped out. The land-owning classes, whether those who owned great country estates or those who owned land and buildings in mining companies, need think no more about paying capital or interest on their bonds. Whatever income formerly went to the bond or mortgage holders will hereafter be retained by the stockholders.

"Business men and manufacturers who have carried on or extended their business with borrowed money now own the properties they have controlled, with virtually nothing to pay for other people's money that they borrowed. Stockholders in all sorts of enterprises have not only gained in this way, but they have also reaped another profit, because the prices of goods which they sell have risen far more rapidly than the wages and salaries they pay.

BANKS AMONG BIGGEST PROFITEERS.

"The larger banks also have been great profiteers. Not only have they had peculiar facilities for purchasing foreign money and securities and thus taking advantage of the falling exchange, but they have charged fabulous rates for loans and given relatively low interest on deposits. In Essen yesterday the leading banks were lending at the rate of 5 per cent per day, or 150 per cent per month; and, although this meant that they were charging for money at the rate of 1,800 per cent per year they were paying only a rate of 18 per cent per year for deposits, or one-hundredth of what they charged.

"The owners of large department stores also profited from the situation. The largest dry goods stores, haberdashers, booksellers, jewelers, hat shops—even hotels—sell what they sell at prices adjusted to the daily fluctuating exchange. Goods are marked with basic prices, and when sold their prices are multiplied by a coefficient, which varies each day according to 'the value of the mark.' Thus, in a restaurant, on the menus and wine cards the same prices may appear from day to day, but at the top of the card appears the coefficient of the day—commonly called the 'multiplier,' or 'Schlüsselzahl.' In a restaurant where I lunched yesterday the prices of the menus would have seemed moderate, even according to old-time standards, till one observed at the bottom of the card that the 'multiplier' of the day was 91,000,000. The bill for a very fair meal for two persons amounted to one and a half billions, to which I added four hundred millions as a tip, making a total cost of about $3."

I wish to insert certain passages from the most recent report of the United States Department of Agriculture upon foreign crops. The report is dated March 19 and the passages cited are from pages 223 and 224. It will be interesting for Members of the House to discover that while they were voting a gift of $10,000,000 to purchase grains and other foodstuffs for supposed starving Germans the German farmers, millers, and flour merchants were petitioning their government for relief not for the starving population of their country but for the ruinous importation of flour. Should the petition of these farmers and merchants be granted, it will be interesting to know whether our Government will be obliged to pay German customs dues upon the shipments of foodstuffs purchased by the $10,000,000 when they reach the German frontier. As we have not been deaf to the cries of one class of Germans seeking relief, we ought certainly to listen to the cries for relief of these others.

GERMAN MEAT SUPPLIES INCREASING.

The German meat situation has been vastly improved in the past three months as a result of the stabilization of the currency early in December. Farmers have been marketing their livestock in increasing numbers after holding them back all during the summer and fall months because of the worthlessness of the currency. The increase in slaughtering over previous months has been general for all animals, but has been particularly important in the case of hogs, and the number still available makes it seem probable that a high rate of slaughter will be maintained for several months unless the currency again suffers a drastic decline.

The policy of holding livestock on the farm adopted by farmers while depreciation of the mark was most rapid, according to Mr. E. C. Squire, agricultural commissioner at Berlin, resulted in the accumulation on October 1 of about two and three-quarter million more hogs intended for slaughter during the following nine months than had existed on the same date a year previous. There was also some increase in the numbers of other animals, but it was not large. None of these stocks were dissipated by increased slaughtering during October and November, when killing is normally high, especially for hogs, and they are only now coming into the market. The slaughter of cattle and sheep since stabilization occurred, it should be noted, has been comparatively low, partially because of the small increase in those animals during 1923, but also because supplies of hay and straw are greater than at any time since the war. There was a tendency in normal times, moreover, for such a slaughter to appear low in comparison with that of hogs at that time of year.

The prospects for hog production in Germany, at least until the fore part of February, were quite favorable, according to Mr. Squire, as the feeding ratio between hogs and grain was still satisfactory, though not so unusually profitable to farmers as earlier in the season. It is not likely that there will be any great increase over production, as shown by the census of last October, principally because the potato crop was only of medium size, but there is at present no reason to expect decreased production.

The increased slaughtering is already being reflected in the trade in pork products. German official statistics show decreasing imports of bacon at the end of the year, and there has recently been some tendency for imports of lard to accumulate at German ports. Data on American exports of pork products during February indicate that a considerable decline in trade with the Continent took place during the month, and a very large share of our continental trade is with Germany. The most important decrease occurred in lard exports, but trade in meat products also fell off.

The figures for inspected slaughtering at the 36 most important establishments as given below are an accurate indication of the trend of meat production in Germany.

DEMAND FOR FLOUR TARIFF IN GERMANY.

The German flour milling industry has been laboring under difficulties for some time. The millers claim that under present conditions it is impossible for the German flour mills to compete with the flour mills of other countries, particularly those of the United States and Canada. Until the ending of the German bread control in October, 1923, the flour mills were materially aided by receiving their allotments of grain to grind for Government account. Consequently conditions have become worse in recent months.

It is reported that during the first part of February there were over 50 meetings held by the farmers associations and the milling industries to demand relief, and their chief demand was for an import tariff on flour to compensate for the turnover tax. The German minister of food maintained that this import tariff can not be imposed, as it would be shifted to the consumer. However, many milling associations and merchants are hopeful that some form of tariff will be provided.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to the time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 27 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] was mistaken—innocently so, of course—in some of the statements he has just made. He said that Secretary Hoover did not indorse this bill. He also read from the testimony of Mr. Hoover his statement that the major problem in Germany is now being solved without our assistance.

But the gentleman did not read all of the Secretary's testimony. Let me read to you from the testimony of Secretary Hoover some things which the gentleman from Massachusetts omitted. The Secretary pointed out—page 132 of the hearings—the difference in the two problems which he had presented. The first of these, he says, is the food supply and the other the idleness and destitution and suffering among certain classes. He said, "The first problem is the maintenance of a basic food supply for the country." This first problem, the "major problem of imports," he says, "appears to be in process of solution."

But the gentleman from Massachusetts made no mention of the second problem to which Mr. Hoover specifically alluded; "the problem of poverty, unemployment in the country, and of inability of a certain class in the country to reach the food supply, even if it is available."

See what a difference is made in the testimony of a witness when we quote all that he said on a given subject. Not only is the food supply a problem, but so also is the inability of the people to reach it, because they are out of work and can not get money to buy anything. The first, Mr. Hoover said, the major problem, should solve itself in normal fashion without calling on the American people. The second is simply the problem of relief for millions of innocent women and children too poor to buy food and now slowly starving. That is the testimony.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts said that Mr. Hoover did not specifically indorse this bill. Let us see whether he did. Turn to page 134. "Would it be asking too much," inquired Mr. LINTHICUM, "for you to say how you feel with reference to this bill?" Secretary Hoover answered, "I can feel only one way about children."

I will read from a part of Secretary Hoover's statement at that point (p. 135):

With a record of having engaged in the relief of somewhere upward of 20,000,000 children in these 23 different countries in Europe, I could not oppose but must support provision against the undernourishment of children anywhere. I can argue very heartily on the failures of adults and the misdoings and misdeeds of the governments that bring these situations about, but I can not apply those arguments against children. Our one hope is that the next generation will be better than this one, and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment. I recognize the many arguments that may be brought against charitable action either by private agencies or by our Government, but I refuse to apply these arguments to children.

[Applause.]

Now, what is the condition of the children in Germany? Here is the testimony of General Allen, a gallant soldier, brave in battle, decorated for conspicuous service to his country.

Crippling rickets, bone and joint and gland tuberculosis are common and there is much skin infection among school children. Scurvy is less common but increases. A form of ulceration of the eye easily leading to blindness unless quickly recognized, but speedily curable with fresh milk and suitable diet, is noticeable.

Then General Allen speaks of the weakness and faintness in school of children because of the lack of food.

Now listen and hear what undoubtedly was in the mind of Secretary Hoover when he said that he could not apply some of the arguments we have heard to-day to children:

The extent of undernourishment in the schoolroom is best expressed by the fact that practically everywhere there is a discrepancy of almost two years between the age, the height, and the weight of the children in contrast with the normal child. Photographs have shown that, and I noticed it myself before leaving Germany. Few, if any, children over 4 have had milk in the cities since 1914, unless they were sick in hospitals.

Listen to that—

Few, if any, children over 4 have had milk in the cities since 1914, unless they were sick in hospitals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. I yield two additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for two additional minutes:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin (reading):

During our first days on the Rhine none of us drank cow's milk. We thought it was advisable to reserve it for the children. That was as long ago as 1919.

There is very much more of that sort of testimony that I ought to read but can not for lack of time. It shows the dreadful condition of thousands of women and children in Germany.

The Constitution has been invoked against this bill. It has been suggested repeatedly that no fair interpretation of the general-welfare clause of the Constitution would justify this appropriation. One gentleman went so far as to say that the Constitution does not permit an appropriation of money that is to be used outside of this country. But such appropriations have been repeatedly made for more than a hundred years. Men who were living when the Constitution was adopted voted for those appropriations.

Suppose that to-day the cholera were raging in Mexico, and that it were beyond the control of the Mexican people and of the Mexican Government. There is nothing between Mexico and this country to prevent such an epidemic from spreading throughout our Southern States—and could not the Congress of the United States constitutionally make an appropriation of Government funds, and send the money to the Mexican Government for use there to prevent the cholera from coming here? Would not such use of public money tend powerfully to promote the "general welfare" of this country? When we gave thousands of dollars to the people of the South, who had had their homes washed away and their property destroyed, did we violate the Constitution?

Mr. TYDINGS. That was within the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That makes no difference. The cholera could come across the invisible boundary into the United States and do vastly more damage than could a Mississippi River flood; and we would have a perfect right to make such an appropriation "to provide," in the language of the Constitution, "for the general welfare."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP].

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the resolution, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the resolution to donate $10,000,000 to relieve the starving women and children in Germany, which we are now considering, was introduced by Congressman Fish, of New York, who served with great distinction in the World War. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and, after extended hearings, said committee made a favorable report to the House.

The first question that naturally arises is this: What is the actual condition of the women and children of Germany? For an answer to this question we must carefully examine the evidence that was presented to the committee. The men and women who appeared before the committee were of the highest character, whose good faith no one can question. They were also intelligent, and had made careful and thorough investigation.

I know of no one whose word would be entitled to more weight on this subject than Gen. Henry T. Allen, of the United States Army. He was commander of the Ninetieth Division during the World War, and later was commander of the American Army of Occupation until our troops were withdrawn from Europe. Since then he has been deeply interested in this matter, and has been at the head of a charitable organization which has been raising money among the American people to relieve distress in Germany, the money raised being turned over to a committee of Quakers for distribution among the needy. It may safely be assumed that no man has more accurate information than General Allen. After referring to the funds that had been raised by private subscriptions he said:

Much larger sums are necessary and the crisis does not permit of delay in providing relief. . . . To cope effectively with the situation, to provide the immediate relief that is imperative, will be beyond the capacity of private undertakings. . . . I feel that the movement is one in which all civilization is directly and deeply concerned. It is nonpolitical and nonracial. . . . It is a question of humanity, of civilization, of peace, and for them we make our appeal.

Among those who appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee was Mr. James H. Causey, an influential banker of Denver, Colo. He visited Europe last summer on a mission for Denver University, a well known Methodist institution, of which he is a trustee, with no thought of taking part in any charitable enterprise, but he was so impressed with the poverty and distress prevailing in Germany that he became deeply interested in the problem of relieving it, and remained there long after the time he had fixed for his return. Let me quote a few passages from his statement to the committee:

. . . In the Ruhr there are 6,000,000 people. There is hunger on the most enormous scale that I have ever seen, and I have had a great deal to do with charity and relief work.

. . . May I speak of the suffering I saw? I went into the hospital at Gelsenkirchen. Everybody had been turned out at the city hospital excepting very little children, and if I should bring a picture to this committee of what I believe to be the typical condition of the children in the Ruhr there would not be a moment's hesitation about relief from America. I saw little children, 120 in one hospital, suffering from tuberculosis; and bear in mind that tuberculosis among little children between the ages of 2 and 6 was not known in Germany before the war. It is simply due to malnutrition and absence of food. . . . I am satisfied that children of Gelsenkirchen and Essen were literally starving to death, and babies that were not born during the war.

. . . I myself went immediately to The Hague and sent down, through the Dutch Red Cross, two carloads of milk and essential medicine and rice and a few things of that kind. I went into schools where I was not expected, simply dropped in casually, not as a tourist, as I had given up sailing home, and I saw children in the various schoolrooms. They would call them up; and I said, "What is the age of this child?" I saw this in more than one school building, and I saw children who, as they would come up, I would say, "What is the age?" I figured the children's ages in these various schools from the standpoint of undernourishment, and in many cases my guess was half their real ages. I saw one woman actually fainting in the street from hunger. I saw long lines of people waiting for food. The condition of suffering and hunger among children and women in and out of hospitals and feeding stations is such as you could not imagine could exist in a civilized industrial district just a few miles from Holland.

. . . I could not possibly exaggerate the need of those little babies of the Ruhr, who were not born during the war. To show you how deeply it gripped my heart, I laid aside my banking business in Denver; I gave up my family and stayed there three months. I went from door to door in England, where I was not known, to raise money. They could hardly believe what I told them about it. An economist of Cambridge University went, at the request of several bankers in England, to find out if it was true, and reported that it was true.

. . . The good that I think America would do by way of this relief would be beyond all the millions that this committee could possibly give, whatever you appropriate. It would be a matter of good will to starving children, who were not born during the war, who are this moment dying. I think how they shivered in the cold in October, November, and December, and think of a day like this in the Ruhr among the little children who have not the necessary food for cold weather. There is suffering in an industrial civilized community such as was never known before.

. . . The distress is immediate. It is there now. I saw two old women going into a feeding station so weak they could not carry the bucket of food they could get. A little boy was trying to take a bucket home, but he was too weak to carry it to his young starving brothers and sisters. The need is now. When I was in Essen in front of a hospital under Sister Johanna a woman dropped, having fainted from hunger; another was dead with a few potatoes in her pocket, having died of starvation in a tramcar while I was there.

Dr. Wilbur K. Thomas is secretary of the American Friends Service Committee. The Quakers, true to their traditions and convictions, have been doing a noble work in Europe. Doctor Thomas has been on the ground. He has heard with his own ears and has seen with his own eyes. Said he, among many other things, to the Foreign Affairs Committee:

. . . Germany is much worse off than any other country. . . . Figures from one district may be of interest to you. Falkenstein, in Saxony, had 2,200 school children in November, 1923. Of that number 1,351 were in need of extra food, as they did not have enough at home; 1,500 had not sufficient clothes; 1,000 were without sufficient shoes. * * * A great many have to be sent home during school hours because they are in a fainting condition.

Prof. Ernest M. Patterson, of the University of Pennsylvania, went to Germany in December, 1923, for the express purpose of investigating the extent to which relief was necessary, and this is the estimate that he gave to the Foreign Affairs Committee:

* * * The situation has been described by so many this morning that I will not dwell on many aspects, although they are serious. The total number of people in Germany that are in need of more or less relief has been estimated this morning as high as 20,000,000. I have reached approximately the same conclusion with such information as I have before me.

Dr. Haven Emerson, of New York, is professor of public health administration of Columbia University. This is one of the great universities of the world. On January 14, 1924, he made a written report of an investigation he had made of conditions in Germany just prior thereto. Doctor Emerson was especially fitted by training and experience to make such investigation, and his report may therefore be looked upon as authoritative. It would be most enlightening to incorporate herein the entire report, but time and space forbid, and I therefore give only the following extracts:

* * * It is not uncommon to find 15 per cent and even 25 per cent of the children under 2 years of age in hospitals suffering from lung tuberculosis. This has been a development of the past 12 to 18 months and is a new experience in the hospitals visited.

The runabout child—2 to 5 years—is less commonly sturdy than the infant under 1, partly because no child over 4, unless in the hospital, and in most places no child over 2 years of age, gets any fresh cow's milk, except as a rare treat, and partly because of lack of suitable shoes and outer clothing they are kept indoors and suffer from lack of light and air.

* * * From infancy to school age marked rickets is so common, anemia, listlessness, sunken eyes, and emaciation are so generally seen that one loses a sense of proportion and is inclined to underestimate the extent of depreciation of vitality which is almost everywhere obvious among the children of the wage earners, the lesser public officials, and the 20 to 40 per cent of the adult population who are unemployed.

* * * Among children of school age there is a prevalence of tuberculosis not known to school physicians heretofore. Lack of breakfast, and often of lunch, lack of shoes, or worn-out or felt shoes, lack of stockings, underclothes, and winter coats are all so common that the undersized, pallid, listless, thin children seem but the natural result. The weakness of children from hunger is a common cause of fainting, dizziness, headache, and inability to study. Up to 20 per cent of children applying at 6 years for admission to school have to be sent home as unfit to attend. * * * The temperature of classrooms can rarely be kept up to 60° F.

* * * Few, if any, children over 4 have had milk in the cities since 1914, unless they were sick in the hospitals.

* * * Examinations which I made of upward of 300 children of preschool and school ages fully confirms the reports which had been received by the health officers of districts and cities throughout Germany in November, 1923, to the effect that ragged, soiled, thin, unsuitable, or worn-out underclothes and shoes were to be found to an extent never known to teachers, nurses, or doctors before.

* * * Premises formerly forbidden as unfit for human habitation are now crowded, in cellars below street level, in attics with no artificial light, with the occasional heat from the cook stove, warmed up once a day—and still whole families have to resort to the municipal lodging house for lack of other shelter. Every city visited has thousands of homeless people for whom housing in any reasonable sense of the word is impossible. The children suffer most from these conditions, and while public and private institutions are closing for lack of means to meet the upkeep, the appeals to them to give shelter to the children increase.

Representatives of the Protestant and Catholic churches appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee. On this question they were in one accord. On this question there could be no difference among the followers of the Master.

Rev. Samuel McCrea Cavert, general secretary of the Federated Council of Churches of Christ in America, representing 29 Protestant denominations, thus stated the attitude of the Protestant churches represented by him:

* * * I am glad of the opportunity to say a brief word about the interest of the churches in this question which you are considering. That interest, I am convinced, is rapidly becoming very great, and for two reasons: First, because our churches are now becoming aware of the fact that there is a desperate need in Germany; and, second, because they are convinced that in the face of this need there is an opportunity to manifest the spirit of good will in an unusual way.

This interest of the churches is not based merely upon secondhand information or upon hearsay evidence. Beginning with last summer we have made very deliberate efforts to find out what is happening in Germany. Last summer there were more than a score of leading church officials of the denominations which are represented in the Federated Council of Churches who made it their business to go, or who happened to be in Germany, for greater or shorter periods, and they all bear unanimous testimony to the need that exists. I shall not go into it in detail, because it simply corroborates what you have already heard in a convincing way.

I will only add that to my knowledge, after having talked to certainly more than 20 leading church people who were in Germany last summer, we are convinced that the facts that have been given us by people like General Allen, Doctor Emerson, and Doctor Patterson are understated rather than overstated.

Father Joseph Lubeley, rector of Holy Trinity Church of St. Louis, Catholic, traveled through Germany during the summer and fall of 1923, for the purpose of learning the truth about conditions in Germany. He made a thorough investigation and reported his findings to the Foreign Affairs Committee. In this report I call your attention to the following statements:

* * * There are six or seven millions of children who are suffering actual want and hunger. A large percentage of these children are either threatened with, or have already contracted tuberculosis, rickets, and other afflictions incident to undernourishment. They are poorly clad and shod. I have seen hundreds of boys who had no shirts or underwear, covering their naked bodies only with a torn coat. In several schools that I visited in Munich, Darmstadt, Frankfurt on the Main, Hanover, and other cities I found that 50 per cent of the children had come without breakfast. The majority had only one meal a day, consisting of potatoes, turnips, and coarse bread.

There is an appalling shortage of milk in all large cities. The supply is not sufficient even for the smallest and most needy infants.

* * * It is practically impossible to secure medical attention in case of sickness. Parents are not able to pay doctors' bills and the price of medicine is prohibitive. I have seen many cases where children, who were seriously ill, were permitted to remain without medical care, without proper food, without heat, hopelessly abandoned to their fate.

One of the saddest features is the plight of expectant mothers. Thousands of them are aware that they must enter the shadow of the valley of death without any of the loving ministrations that have been made impossible by existing conditions.

A great deal of relief work has been done by private and collective charity, most of which has come from the United States. In this way individuals and families and, in some instances, entire communities have been reached. But the misery is so general and the existing relief measures so inadequate that nothing short of a large and generous appropriation by the Congress of the United States can insure even a small measure of relief. * * * Now that peace has been restored we see the German nation prostrate and crucified. Innocent women and children, many of the latter born after the end of the war, are literally starving to death. * * * It is for us to say whether thousands, yes, millions, should be abandoned to a slow and agonizing death when we are in a position to prevent further anguish by lending a helping hand.

Much other evidence of like character was submitted to the Foreign Affairs Committee. I wish I could make specific reference to all of it, but that is manifestly impossible. However, I do want to add the following extract from a communication of the American ambassador in Berlin:

In large areas of Berlin more than 50 per cent of the children are tubercular; they are weak from undernourishment. There is less than 50 per cent of the amount of milk necessary to supply their needs and they are entirely without fuel with which to warm their homes.

Who can doubt such testimony? No one. Who can doubt that many, many women and children of Germany will die of starvation unless the American Government comes to their rescue? No one. We are then confronted with this question. Shall we save them or shall we let them perish? The responsibility rests upon us. There is no way in which we can escape it. We must determine the issue of life or death for helpless women and innocent children. We can not ease our consciences by closing our eyes. We can not evade our duties and obligations by passing by on the other side. Two well known biblical characters attempted that many years ago and thereby gained eternal condemnation. The good Samaritan will be one of the most beloved characters as long as the world stands. Every individual and every nation should remember the closing words of the parable, as spoken by Jesus Himself: "Go, and do thou likewise."

Bear in mind to whom this resolution proposes to render aid—women and children. By common consent they are exempt from the conflicts of the world. And well it is that such is the case.

Women personify the gentler virtues. They are the mothers of the race. They pass through the valley of the shadow of death to give us life. They care for us and watch over us from the cradle to the grave. Their holy ministrations are ever with us. They never cease in well doing. They have infinite patience. A thousand duties are theirs, but they never falter and never grow weary. They are angels of mercy. Again and again in the home and in the hospital they ease our pain and suffering. Their love surpasseth all understanding. Their charity, forgiveness, and mercy are akin to the divine. Shall we stand by and let women perish from starvation when we have the power to save them? No! No! Such a course would not represent the humane and generous impulses of the American people.

The devotion of women to a cause or an ideal is often extraordinary. In this connection I can not refrain from making reference to Mrs. Causey, now deceased. She was the wife of the Denver banker who has done so much to relieve distress and hunger in Germany. Let me tell the story in the words of Congressman VAILE, of Denver, who is personally familiar with it:

I want to call attention to the fact that Mr. Causey's wife died while he was in Germany. He had written her about his work, and her own heart was so engaged in it that, although she knew she was stricken with a fatal malady, she did not tell him of her illness, and asked her daughters in Denver not to tell him for fear that if he knew he would come back.

He never did know until after she was dead, and then at the urgent solicitation of his daughters he stayed on with a breaking heart to get his work further under way.

Children typify innocence. They come into a world which they do not understand. They are the innocent victims of its passions, discords, and strife. Yet, in many ways they redeem the world. None ever paid greater tribute to children than the Savior of mankind, when he said:

Suffer little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Children often bring heaven down to earth. Many of the children in Germany have already succumbed to starvation and sickness. The skies were dark when they were born, and the skies were still dark when they passed out. The joys of childhood, which should belong to all, they never knew. Hunger was their lot, death their grim relief. We do not know how providence adjusts things, but perhaps a kind and merciful God will make up for them in the next world what they lost in this. Millions of children may yet be saved. It is, indeed, true that many, though saved from death, may never be able to take any real part in this world. Their little bodies are broken, and, in a large measure, they will always be helpless. But we can not abandon them to their cruel fate. He, whom we profess to follow, left this message to all generations:

Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.

In all the world nothing is sadder and more heart-rending than the wailing cry of starving and dying children.

In a matter of this kind I would not make an argument from a selfish standpoint. Such an argument would be wholly out of place, for the American people do not mingle a selfish spirit with their charities. But even from a selfish standpoint, it may prove a blessing to us to give this assistance, for it will partially relieve the very serious depression that now exists among the farmers of this country, by disposing of part of their surplus products, the resolution providing that the grain, fats, and other products shall be purchased in this country and transported to Europe in American ships.

Europe is now torn and bleeding. Things have been going from bad to worse. To be sure, a generous act on our part can not restore Europe to a normal condition, but to some extent at least it will assist in bringing peace to a troubled world. In this connection permit me to call your attention to this further statement from General Allen:

I look upon this matter not only as a matter of humanity and civilization, but also as having a direct bearing in the matter of peace.

Some have expressed a doubt as to the constitutionality of this resolution. I have no such doubt, but if I did I would not resolve a doubt against starving women and children. If this resolution were unconstitutional, we would be in this unfortunate situation: We could spend billions for war, but nothing to promote peace. We could destroy life, but we could not save life. Such a construction would not be in harmony with the spirit or letter of the Constitution. There are many precedents to sustain this resolution. For more than a hundred years we have followed the same policy. In 1812 we extended aid to Venezuela to relieve the suffering resulting from an earthquake. James Madison was then President. He had been one of the leading members of the convention that framed the Constitution, but he approved the resolution for the relief of Venezuela. If he did not know what the Constitution meant, who did? In great emergencies we have extended aid to foreign nations on a dozen or more occasions. Presidents Polk, Grant, Hayes, Cleveland, McKinley, Roosevelt, Taft, and Harding approved similar legislation. No President ever disapproved such legislation. At this late day, therefore, we need not be disturbed as to the constitutionality of the policy which this country has followed consistently for more than a century.

But why argue about this resolution? Starving women and children are not a subject for argument. They make their own appeal. If their distress does not touch the heart, then no argument can convince the mind.

This is, indeed, a time for action rather than for words. I think I know what the result will be. This House, representing the great American people, the greatest and most generous people on earth, will never vote against relief for dying women and children.

Gentlemen of the House, I am heartily in favor of this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted to me I will not be able to give all the reasons that prompt me to support this resolution. The dictates of humanity and the sympathy all men have for suffering and dying children is my justification. There is ample precedent for the adoption of the resolution. The women and children of Germany are the innocent victims of war, and America as a great Christian Nation can perform no finer service nor a service that will live longer in the hearts of all Germany than to extend its helping hand to a suffering people, as provided in the pending resolution. Therefore I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a quarter of a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERLMAN].

Mr. PERLMAN. Mr. Chairman, this Congress could pass no more humane resolution or bill than this resolution appropriating $10,000,000 for the relief of the starving women and children in Germany. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor of fighting against the Germans over in France but I did not make war on women and children. I am going to support this resolution and will be very happy to vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KINDRED]. [Applause.]

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to adopt the pending measure, the Fish bill, means to extend the era of good feeling in Germany and throughout our distraught world, and to extend the era of good feeling and good will fundamentally lays the foundation for the banishment of war and the stabilization of the troubled world of to-day.

To pass this resolution means to provide for real and lasting peace in the future, in my humble opinion. Therefore, I favor the prompt emergency relief provided in this resolution, not only for the humanitarian reasons which have been mentioned but for the reasons which I have also briefly referred to. To adopt this resolution also means to relieve, in a certain measure, our distressed farmers of the Northwest, the farmers who grow wheat and grain, who will be relieved and benefited to the extent to which this appropriation will go in order to buy grain for the starving women and children of Germany who are, to my personal knowledge as a physician, to-day suffering, to the number of hundreds of thousands with malnutrition, with tuberculosis, with inanition, with marasmus, and other diseases incident to malnutrition and starvation.

I, therefore, urge that we may, without quibbling over constitutional questions and without hairsplitting over the real desires of the taxpayers of this country, pass this measure, because I know the people wish this resolution to pass, and I urge that it pass as speedily as possible. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Colonel ANDREW, said that there are at the present time two distinct Germanies; that there exists to-day the Germany of the rich industrial, who spends his money at French watering places and Italian watering places and who drives high-powered motors, and that there also exists to-day the Germany of the common people—that means the Germany of the poor, the Germany of starving women and starving children.

I am just as much to-day against the Germany of the rich industrial as I was in 1917 and 1918. I am glad the French went into the Ruhr and they should have gone in sooner. [Applause.] But I am not against the women and children who are starving in Germany. [Applause.]

Ordinarily, I am against such legislation as this; I am heartily for this legislation, however, and I propose to vote for it, with the majority of the rest of you. I know this House will pass this resolution.

We have in this country a moral obligation which I hope we can partially pay off by this resolution through the aid which we give. The armistice came on the 11th of November, 1918.

Theodore Roosevelt said in 1915 in Fear God and Take Your Own Part that—

There exist in this Nation, as in other nations, two types of idealists—the practical idealists, who are the true servants of the people and the true leaders of the State, and the impractical idealists, who are actuated by high motives but who lead to disaster.

I sat in wet French villages after the armistice and watched back of us in Paris the impractical idealism of those who sought to apply to the immediate and pressing needs an attempted ultimate solution of world peace. [Applause.] From after the armistice until April, 1919, I served on the staff of General Allen himself, the distinguished commander of a combat division, a brave and gallant soldier, one who fought the Germans, but one who to-day leads the movement for aid to the starving women and children of the former enemy. [Applause.]

The impractical idealism of the United States in December, 1918, and during the conference at Versailles, prevented France and England and Belgium from within a few weeks of the armistice promptly fixing the amount of the indemnity, re-establishing stable economic conditions in Germany, feeding the women and children, and starting the beaten enemy on the payment of just and due reparations.

Instead of this, impractically ideal, we delayed the just and final settlement until France was forced to go into the Ruhr. We so mixed the ultimate hope of world peace with the immediate business settlement of the war itself that, eager to settle the affairs of all the world, we settled none. So to-day the conditions in Germany, as well as the reparations, are unsettled. No man who ever saw real war wants war again. No human being can be more opposed to war than those who have known its actual horrors; but those who have known real war recognize that the practical and realizable ideal is often delayed by the impractical idealist.

In December, 1918, there were two problems—immediate settlement and ultimate world peace. We delayed that immediate settlement. Part of the results of that delay we can to-day alleviate by this aid to the starving women and children of Germany. We never did and never will make war on babies and mothers. I am for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

[Mr. SIMMONS was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I propose to vote for this resolution because I believe it is right and because I believe that the people who live in the heart of America, the great Mississippi Valley States, approve of it; but I can not do it without calling to the attention of this Congress the fact that here in America, out in the great Northwest section, are American citizens and American children whose parents are facing bankruptcy, enduring privations, suffering poverty, and hoping against hope for the future.

They have been before this Congress asking that the generous consideration of the American people be extended toward its own citizens and they are coming again asking for that relief. Out in this same section American citizens, parents of American children, on reclamation projects are trying to bring the desert to produce abundantly. They are coming before this Congress asking that generous consideration be given to their welfare, to their future, and the future of their children. They are going to expect that relief in the same measure as this day we propose to extend in relief to the children of Germany. I can not but think that in America, in the factory towns and cities, there are children who are undernourished, underfed, and denied proper educational advantages, such as we want American children to have, and they are waiting for this Congress to put in motion the legislation that will bring them relief through the submission to the States of the child labor amendment to the Constitution. It is high time, gentlemen, that we give a thought to America and to American children and to needed legislation for the relief of the farmers of the Northwest. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there are a number of reasons why I sincerely wish I could see my way clear to support this bill. The conditions as described before the Committee on Foreign Affairs by the witnesses who appeared to testify concerning this measure were harassing to the heart. I think I have as much of human sympathy as most men, and I do not wish to do any act that would make it seem that I did not possess such sympathy. I am not unmindful, either, of the political psychology of this situation. I would be blind, indeed, if I were. I am not unmindful of the possible effect that it may have upon our international relations. That is a thing to be seriously considered. But, Mr. Chairman, I am unable to find anywhere in the Constitution of this country, which I have sworn to support, the authority which enables me to give my support to this measure. I regard myself as the trustee of an express trust in disposing of the moneys collected by taxation upon the people of this country. I can not subscribe to the doctrine which gentlemen have laid down here that because, forsooth, the issue has never been presented to the Supreme Court of the United States in a form in which it could pass upon and determine the constitutionality of such measures I am thereby excluded from the duty of considering and construing the Constitution for myself. Indeed, the very fact that the matter has not been determined by the Supreme Court to my mind charges me more solemnly with the duty of scrutinizing that instrument before I undertake to pass upon legislation of this kind and character.

I wish, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to make it clear that I am not in any respect whatever influenced in my vote by the slightest prejudice against the German people—by the slightest feeling growing out of the war itself. I do deplore, I do resent, the action of the German Government, as distinguished from the German people, in deliberately violating the integrity of their own financial system in order to escape the obligations that rested upon the German Government, as described by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW]. Even that will not influence me in my vote upon this question. I am influenced solely and alone, as I have been on all similar bills that have arisen in the past, by the determination in my own mind that I can not consistently with my duty as a Representative under the terms of the Constitution and the genius of this Republic give my support to any such measure. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I have listened attentively to the speeches that have been made upon this resolution this afternoon. I think it is a sad day in the history of this great deliberative body when Members of this House arise on the floor and declare that they care not what the Constitution of the United States says, and as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLELLER] said a few moments ago, he intended to vote for this measure, "Constitution or no Constitution," and thus tread upon it with unholy feet. One of the first flags of our country had an inscription written upon it, "Don't tread on me!" I think we had better write these words anew in letters of fire across the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BATHURNE], a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard, said he thought that the passage of this resolution would be a panacea for Bolshevism; but I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the best insurance against Bolshevism in America is fidelity to the fundamental law of this great Republic. [Applause.]

The best engine that can be put into the ship of state to drive you safely over a treacherous sea—and we are sailing a treacherous sea in this awful hour in which we live—is the great, propelling force of the Constitution of the United States.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] has said that private charity has failed, and by virtue of the fact that private charity has failed us in this emergency, we should run roughshod, as it were, over the Constitution of the United States and take out of the pockets of the taxpayers money for the alleviation of the suffering people on the other side of the sea. There is not a warrant to be found in the Constitution of the United States that will authorize this Congress to take money out of the Public Treasury and appropriate it for the alleviation of the suffering of any people outside of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Justice Story, in his commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, said:

A power to lay taxes for any purposes whatsoever is a general power; a power to lay taxes for certain specified purposes is a limited power. A power to lay taxes for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is not in common sense a general power. It is limited to those objects. It can not constitutionally transcend them. If the defense proposed by a tax be not the common defense of the United States, if the welfare be not general, but special or local as contradistinguished from national, it is not within the scope of the Constitution. If the tax be not proposed for the common defense or general welfare, but for other objects wholly extraneous—as, for instance, for propagating Mohammedanism among the Turks or giving aids and subsidies to a foreign nation to build palaces for its kings or erect monuments to its heroes—it would be wholly indefensible upon constitutional principles. The power, then, is under such circumstances necessarily a qualified power.

There is absolutely no grant by the Constitution, either expressed or implied, of any such power to Congress. We have no constitutional right to take $10,000,000, or any other sum, out of the Public Treasury and give it to foreigners "over there."

As was well said in an argument at the hearings against the proposed taxation of American citizens for so-called relief of Germany:

It is respectfully submitted that under the Constitution of the United States no power has been delegated to Congress to take money by force from American citizens, through taxation, for any purpose whatever except as clearly expressed or implied in the Constitution itself.

The power to appropriate the funds of American citizens and taxpayers, held in trust in the Federal Treasury, to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States is a limited power. Otherwise the repeated declaration of the Supreme Court that this is a "Government of limited powers" is without meaning.

Whatever the limitations of the power of Congress under the "general welfare" clause may be, whatever difference of opinion existed between Hamilton and Madison, Story and Jefferson, Monroe and Pierce as to the extent of this power within the United States, it is submitted that even the broadest interpretation of the "general welfare" clause stops at the 3-mile limit. Neither by legal sophistry nor by stretch of imagination can it be maintained that Congress can tax the American people for local relief in a foreign country—a recent enemy of the United States—under pretext of providing for the "general welfare" of the United States.

Mr. RATHBONE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Mississippi. I have only four minutes. I hope the gentleman will let me have them. By refusing to yield I do not mean to be discourteous in any way.

Not only that, gentlemen, but Alexander Hamilton, I think, one of the greatest men who have contributed of his ability to the sum total of this Republic's greatness, has even questioned the right of the Congress of the United States to appropriate money out of its Public Treasury for the alleviation of suffering where it is confined to localities in this Nation in which we live. And yet we propose here by the passage of this resolution to send money to Germany to alleviate human suffering on the other side of the sea.

I have no prejudice in my heart against the German people, but I can not agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE], who said that Germany had always been a friend to the United States of America.

In 1914 the world was set on fire by a people whose ambition for power led innocent peoples everywhere into the valley of destruction. Our country, one of the last to take up arms in defense of a Christian civilization, stood for years upon the brink of this great catastrophe and prayed if it was possible that the bitter cup of war might not be pressed to the lips of this Republic. But war was finally waged upon us, an innocent, unoffending Nation, by Germany; our country was forced by those people to enter the World War and rescue civilization. In this holy task our country spent not only billions of dollars but the blood of its brave men.

Many hillside of Europe are now dotted with almost countless crosses as a sad testimonial of the awful sacrifice. Not only that, but we loaned to foreign countries billions and billions of dollars in order to carry on the great conflict. Our people, as far as responsibility for this war was concerned, were as innocent as the babies of the world. Yet the innocent people of my country suffered, and are still suffering, for the sins of the guilty.

Europe, not contented with billions of American dollars and thousands of human lives, still draws another draft upon us in the form of a request for $10,000,000 for the relief of the German people. I am in accord with all humanitarian movements. I recognize personally the responsibility of all those who are able to contribute to the needy millions of the world. But charity should begin at home. The same blessed voice that said: "Go ye into all the world" also said "Begin at Jerusalem."

Thousands of people in our great country even now are without sufficient food or clothing. Countless thousands of our people are still suffering from the effects of a war instigated and brought about by a people who now propose to have $10,000,000 contributed to them out of our Treasury. There are poor people all over our country without the necessities of life. The farmers of America, that great body of people who contribute most and get the least back from civilization, are now in want in many sections. They are literally crying for bread, and you have only given them stones, and yet you propose now to give the people of Germany $10,000,000 for their relief out of our Treasury and thus take it out of the taxpayers' pocket. The cry of this country is for tax reduction and relief for our people, and you in answer to that cry intend to put $10,000,000 additional burden upon their backs and give it to a bunch of foreigners, when you have in your own country thousands of poor people who are in dire need. If you want to raise a fund for the alleviation of suffering people on the other side of the sea, it is a worthy undertaking, but raise it by public subscription as you have done frequently in the past, and let those who are able contribute to it of their own free will and accord, but for the sake of the poor, oppressed people of my country, do not press down another burden upon their already bruised and bleeding shoulders. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA] two minutes.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation called for in this resolution which will bring happiness and health to millions of children is exactly the cost of laying a barrage in time of war of 20 minutes' duration. When we will have passed this resolution the House of Representatives will have done more in three hours toward a constructive movement for good will, friendliness, and peace on earth than the League of Nations has accomplished in five years. [Applause.]

In reply to the forceful statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] I will say that the place to get information about the starving children of Germany is not in the beer halls of Germany. [Applause.] If the economic conditions described by the various speakers exist in Germany, it is well to appropriate money so that the children can grow up and destroy an economic condition where all the wealth is held by a few individuals while millions are permitted to starve. [Applause.]

This bill typifies the generous spirit of the American people. It is a move in the right direction. It will bring a ray of hope to the people of Europe that the American spirit of love, kindness, and charity is still alive. It will be an inspiration to the new countries of Europe. It is far better to appropriate money to relieve such conditions than to spend money to send troops to maintain confines artificially created. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I, too, represent a poor district, and I will say that the underfed people of my district are in favor of such an appropriation by the American Congress. [Applause.]

I want to appeal to my colleagues who are ex-service men to support this resolution. Why? What American soldier is there but would share the water of his canteen with a wounded enemy soldier? Did not the boys of the A. E. F. touch the hearts of all Europe by their kindness to women and children, even in the enemy's country, during the period of occupation? This is the opportunity for America to teach the world to sing instead of a hymn of hate a new hymn of love.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. And I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAWES].

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Chairman, my mind is upon the words of our great war chief, Woodrow Wilson, who took us through war. At the very outset he drew a distinction between the German Army and the German people. As that war progressed every influence of diplomacy and agencies of the War Department itself carried messages to the civil population of Germany of the fact that there was no hostility in America to them; that the war was directly against the German autocrats and militarists. Now, the war has been over for six years. We know there is suffering in Germany, we know there is distress there, and this is the first time that the American Government has had an opportunity of carrying out the thought of President Wilson, recently emphasized by the statement of President Wilson's wife, that the United States of America has no unkind thought for the civilian population of Germany. [Applause.]

When General Allen, of the American Army, appeared before one of our committees and gave individual testimony that there is suffering in Germany, that hardship does exist, that babies are dying, that food is necessary, I for one must accept his statement at its full face value.

What do these $10,000,000 mean? We spent $22,000,000,000 to destroy the great German war machine, and $10,000,000 as a token of our desire to express to the German people the thoughts that were in the minds of Lincoln, the thoughts that were in the mind of Grant, when our Great War was over, it will be money well spent. More than diplomacy, more than words, more than speeches, the $10,000,000 sent to the women and children of Germany will make good the thought that Wilson had, that Wilson's wife has, and that I know exists throughout the United States in the generous hearts of our men and women. [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent, Mr. HAWES, Mr. LA GUARDIA, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin were granted leave to extend their remarks in the Record.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Germany has been living on her fat for about five years. Due to the inflation of the German currency, the great middle classes of the German people have been economically wiped out; they have been changed from a condition of reasonable prosperity to a condition of absolute want. That condition exists among an entire class in that country. This, as I see it, is an opportunity not only to help that condition but an opportunity to express the fact that the soul of the American people recognizes the principle that human suffering creates universal brotherhood. I can support this resolution with my whole heart. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

[By unanimous consent, Mr. CLANCY was granted leave to extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I have heard some arguments here as to the constitutionality of this appropriation, but I have not heard quoted any Supreme Court decision against such an appropriation. I am not a lawyer, but I have enough horse sense to know that until the Supreme Court declares such an item unconstitutional it is constitutional. The learned constitutional lawyers of this body opposing this measure did not mention any adverse Supreme Court decisions because they could not. There are none.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW] tried to quote Secretary of Commerce Hoover as being doubtful about the propriety of this bill, that he was lukewarm or even hostile.

On page 137 of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the hearings reporting Mr. Hoover's appearance before the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], whose bill it was, said after continued efforts to draw out Mr. Hoover and if possible get something from him that might be used against the measure, as well as in favor of it, because he was vigorously cross-questioned by both friends and opponents of the bill, Mr. FISH said:

I am perfectly satisfied with the testimony of the Secretary.

Meaning Secretary Hoover.

That was the way every champion of the bill in the committee felt. We all realized the delicate position of Mr. Hoover as a member of the Cabinet and one who might be construed as a spokesman for the administration and one who might embarrass the administration which apparently did not want to take a definite stand on the bill.

I quote from Mr. Hoover, on page 136 of the hearings:

As to the question of appropriations for the relief of undernourishment in children due to poverty, I must say that I stand for it, provided you are satisfied that private charity or resources from Germany are unable to cope with it.

He left the latter points to the committee as having heard more testimony than he on those questions, and they decided that neither private charity of the United States nor resources of Germany would save the starving children and women of Germany.

Again, on page 134, he said:

I can feel only one way about children.

And then he went on to say he was in favor of feeding them by one agency or another, and in that paragraph, on page 135, he said:

I recognize the many arguments that may be brought against charitable action either by private agencies or by our Government, but I refuse to apply those arguments to children.

One might just as well try to quote Christ against feeding starving women and children as one who has been in the work and seen the actual sufferings as Herbert Hoover.

Another objection raised this afternoon by some of the gentlemen against this appropriation is that we can not spare the money and that we are voting the people's money for another nation when we have pressing needs, and that our own people are in distress in some quarters of this country.

I have heard some of these gentlemen orate here in favor of spending $24,000,000 this year to prevent workmen in Detroit and Americans in other sections of the country from getting a glass of beer. Now some of them argue just as fervently that we can not spare any money to buy millions of starving women and children a bottle of milk per day.

Their slogan is, Millions of the taxpayers' money against a bottle of beer for the American and not a dollar for a bottle of milk for a starving child.

What promotes the general welfare of Germany in this one instance promotes the general welfare of the United States. This is bread upon the waters, and will come back manyfold.

This is one country, and what helps American business helps the American people. If you vote this ten millions it will be well spent in American food and under the supervision of the Red Cross or American Quakers.

We will get it back a hundredfold in German trade and German good will. It will tend to wipe out the bitterness of the recent war.

The American farmer is sick. Agriculture in this country is sick. The chief reason is because the American farmer can not sell his products abroad. Europe must be rehabilitated and Europe can not be rehabilitated until Germany is rehabilitated and can pay the reparations they owe the Allies. Then, also, they can buy our products to the tune of hundreds of millions.

Help to lift Germany out of chaos, help her millions of starving children and women and you help the United States. You help the American farmer, for whom so many gentlemen here this afternoon have pleaded in talking for this bill.

You also save Germany from throwing itself into the arms of Bolshevik Russia. The Washington Herald this morning carries a story of friendly relations beginning between the Soviet of Russia and the laborite Government of England. The screaming headlines clear across the front page say, "Soviet to back aims of British labor."

How much easier to establish a cordiale entente between Germany and Russia in Germany's present condition. I developed that line of thought in questioning the military and political and social authorities who appeared before the For-ign Affairs Committee on this bill. They agreed with me that this menace does exist.

Gen. Henry Allen, formerly a brigade commander in France in the Great War, and later commander of the American Army of occupation in Germany, agreed that it was a matter for most serious thought. So did George Schreiner, Associated Press correspondent for a number of years in Germany.

Contemplate, gentlemen, the danger to Europe and to the United States and to the world if the German organizing genius, its unquestioned bent for leadership, its manufacturing ability, its splendid factories and resources are added to the vast man and soldier power, the food, metals, and raw materials of the giant Russia. Consider the menace of a Russian-German alliance.

What would become of France then and other European countries?

This money should be voted to save Europe from a real menace, from the potential threat of another World War. It should be voted to save starving women and children, aside from any other considerations.

The rule of the sea when the ship is going down is:

Women and children first. Shoot all others who force the lifeboats.

This is surely a case of children and women first.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee which considered this question most carefully for a number of days, hearing many experts on present conditions in Germany and discussing the question vigorously pro and con in executive session, I made my position clear to the committee as an advocate of this relief fund for the starving women and children of Germany. I voted to report the bill favorably to the House.

It was an unusually high grade of experts who appeared before the committee to advocate a favorable report by the committee. The most important of them were patriotic Americans with a record of loyalty and service to this country and to mankind. They could not be accused of German blood, German affiliations, or German sympathies. But even if they could have been accused of German bias, they could not have appealed more earnestly, more sincerely, nor warmly for favorable action by the committee.

Some of them appealed with tears in their eyes for this appropriation. They had seen this terrible suffering of little children and of women, of many mothers, and they had tried to relieve it, and failing, had come to ask our aid.

Secretary Hoover did not want to place the administration in an embarrassing position, but he did declare as an individual and as a man who had powerfully helped starving children and women everywhere during the past 10 years as being in favor of this appropriation.

He did declare himself unqualifiedly for the general principle of this relief, but he did not think himself well enough informed to know whether private charity of Americans was sufficient. He left that to the committee studying the question.

Three days ago I lunched with the Japanese ambassador, Mr. Hanihara. He told me with deep emotion of the gratitude of the Japanese people to the American people who had come to their aid in the recent terrible disaster in Nippon.

He told me the American people had given ten millions first and then about five millions more, a total of fifteen millions. Japan had not asked for the money, but the United States had lived up to its finest traditions. There was no waving of the bloody shirt, no secret jubilation over a mortal blow to a rival in the Pacific.

But there was a deep and sincere expression of horror, of sorrow, and sympathy, and a spontaneous flow of hard, round American dollars to bind up the wounds and heal the spirit of a sorely afflicted people—yellow men—of a race which some would have us hate because we are whites, just as some would have us hate the German women and children who are starving to-day—children born since the war—hate them because we were recently at war with the German people and because they are of a different nationality, although of the same Caucasian race. Formerly the boast in this country was that our ancestors were Germanic, Teutonic, and we will hear more of that when the Immigration bill comes up, but of course the word Germanic will then be camouflaged as Nordic.

The Japanese ambassador put his hand on his heart and he said:

Your people's wonderful generosity touched me here deeply, and it touched the hearts of my people. They will remember that brotherhood-of-man spirit shown in our time of deepest distress when other matters may arise between Japan and the United States unfortunately calculated to disturb the amity of two proud and independent nations.

Gentlemen, that fifteen millions will come back to us a hundredfold in trade with Japan, which buys hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of our products. We know that in Detroit, because we are one of the great exporting cities of the world. We know how many millions you authorize here in Congress to develop American foreign trade.

That fifteen millions will come back to us many fold in retrenchment in military expenditures, because it will tend to relieve the apprehensions of the two countries. Fifteen millions is a mere drop in the bucket in our naval expenditures for defense in the Pacific and in our Army and Navy yearly appropriations.

That statesmanship was engineered by the American Red Cross, not by the American Congress. The Red Cross did not wave the bloody shirt. It just asked what would Christ have done under similar circumstances, and it went ahead confidently to do it, knowing that the American people would ratify the action and respond in ungrudging measure to the appeal.

Some people have said in a deprecatory spirit that much of the Japanese relief fund was given by our banking houses and by our big manufacturers who were doing or hoped to do business in Japan. But, my friends, that merely proves that it was good American business when these hard-headed industrial leaders spent their money in that way.

For all these reasons you should vote for this $10,000,000 appropriation for the starving millions of German children and women.

I fought for relief for the starving women and children of Germany in the committee which reported the bill, my own committee, the House Foreign Affairs Committee, when there was very little sentiment for the appropriation. I am very happy to fight for it on the floor of the House.

I helped to organize in 1914 the Detroit Patriotic Relief Fund to take care of the women and children left in distress by our soldiers who went to the Mexican border in the crisis caused by Villa, the Mexican bandit leader. That fund became the Home Service Section of the American Red Cross, the grandest charity organization in the world's history.

For eight years I worked to relieve distress among women and children, particularly those of the hundred thousand soldiers who left Detroit in the World War. My committee handled hundreds of thousands of dollars and spent it for food, fuel, clothing, medicine, and the necessities of life. I passed upon these cases. Personally I signed the warrants authorizing the expenditures for vast sums for these necessities for women and children.

No taint of scandal, of misappropriated funds, or of waste has ever been made in charges against me or that committee. We aimed to give service in Christ's spirit.

With that record and with the experience of having seen many hungry and needy women and children in those eight years and having contributed to their relief, I can not but vote for this $10,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute and a half to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNELL].

Mr. O'CONNELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am not very much concerned or distressed about the political possibility of this situation. I am thinking about the money that we spent to destroy these people and how little it will cost to bring them back. We have heard a lot this afternoon about the Constitution. The Constitution has been pretty well torn in the last two years, and some of the wounds it has received have not redounded very much to the advantage of our people or anybody else.

I quote from the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I have the honor of being a member:

Imagine, if you will, a mother with helpless, hungry babies, suffering from tuberculosis in a home where the fire is never kindled, even during the coldest winter days. We did not fight women and children, and they were not responsible for the war. Many of the babies have been born since the war. Immediate action by America, through both private and governmental aid, is the only hope of the children in Germany.

How any man can fight little children who are crying for bread is hard to understand, but there are men in the United States who are doing just that because of their hatred for Germany. There is a sinister attempt being made to poison the minds of the American people and to convince them that the Germans are not in desperate circumstances.

We will not stand by with the accumulated wealth of the world and surplus foodstuffs rotting on the ground and watch these helpless children slowly starve to death. We can not afford to be a party to such a policy. There is no other alternative except to let these children starve to death or afford them some immediate relief to maintain them until the next harvest in July. We must and will respond for the sake of humanity and the future peace of the world. Let us not forget the words of Abraham Lincoln, "With malice toward none and charity for all." We should look upon this relief measure as a matter of humanity and civilization, having a direct bearing on peace and good will throughout the world. What is needed in the world to-day is the triumph of the gospel of good will over hatred and revenge.

Secretary Hoover told the committee that "our only hope is that the next generation will be better than this one and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment. I recognize the many arguments that may be brought against charitable action, either by private agencies or by our Government, but I refuse to apply these arguments to children."

Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen, who was commander in chief of the American army of occupation, testified that "relief for the children in Germany will not only save the starving youngsters, but it will help American farmers by taking the surplus food supplies, and is in the interest of peace."

In the light of the suffering of innocent people in Germany I can not stand idly by and refrain from voting for this relief. It would, indeed, be pitiless to refuse to assist and help the people of those districts of Germany where tuberculosis, rickets, anemia, sunken eyes, and emaciation are common occurrences. Hospitals, homes, and asylums of every description are taxed to the uttermost in caring for the sick, but all are handicapped for lack of funds. Worthy respectable institutions have to close their doors. Among the many that can no longer continue are homes for infants, kindergartens, dispensaries for mothers and babies. The infant mortality is astounding. There is a tremendous increase in the mortality from childbirth fever—puerperal poisoning. There is also a large increase in stillbirths and a great diminution in the proportion of mothers who can nurse their babies. The facts concerning this suffering are indisputable.

This is purely a charitable dole. Seneca said:

I must give him that wants else I want. I must give him who is perishing else I perish.

And later Cicero defined charity:

One's purse should not be closed too tightly that a generous impulse can not open it.

I can not help reading of the miserable conditions in Germany without being overwhelmed with an impulse to give. I am sure that the rank and file of the Nation thinks similarly, and Congress must be responsive to that sentiment.

One of the proverbs says:

Withhold not good from them to whom it is due.

We can not and must not withhold this charity. In all common humanity it is due. An old Egyptian legend tells us that before the departed spirit could rest it had to answer certain questions and pass an examination. The spirit could not enter the realm of eternal peace unless it could say:

I have not permitted any man to go hungry. I have not taken milk from the mouths of children. I have given bread to the hungry and water to the thirsty, and I have helped the sick.

To deny this relief would be like turning back the hands of the clock. What the Egyptians did centuries ago, we can do now. It means the relief of children about whom the Master said centuries ago:

Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. O'CONNELL of New York was granted leave to extend his remarks in the Record.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 12½ minutes and the gentleman from Texas 7 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, such generosity as I possess, which I believe to be not less than that of my colleagues, is limited in this connection by the controlling fact that money in the National Treasury is a trust fund, collected, held, and to be disbursed for governmental purposes according to directions given in the Constitution. I can not ignore or violate those directions and be faithful in the discharge of my duty as a Member of the National Congress. We have no right to expend in charities to the needy of other nations funds raised by taxation for governmental purposes. That is a misuse of public moneys. That alone would control my vote; but there are other considerations. We are sending funds of foods to a country where the food is said to be fairly abundant but badly distributed. Gentlemen seem to have the hope that the funds we send over there will be withheld from the well-to-do and the strong and given to the weak and needy. We seem to expect that in some extraordinary manner it will be even kept from the men and given to women and children, that food and money sent from America will be handled much more fairly and humanely by the German people, when it gets among them, than they are handling their own supplies. There is no warrant for that assumption. In addition to that we are starting on a road that has no end. Last year there were 1,250,000 women and children refugees in Greece from Turkey. They slept on the bare ground without cover and were hungry. Since I have been a Member of this body it has been reported that eight or ten million people have died in China of hunger. There is great want in Porto Rico now. The Near East, Russia, even England, and much of the Old World are filled with want at this time, and will always be. If the contents of the Public Treasury are to be disbursed for such purposes as this I wonder where it is to end. I wonder if it will stop when it is claimed that there are millions of men in America without work while their families are in want. Will they be here asking for aid from the Treasury? Will they find us ready to distribute the public funds in charity to them? What will we say to their demands for support from the taxpayers' money? We are starting on a long road which may lead us into dangerous territory.

Mr. RATHBONE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOX. I regret I have not the time. I decline to yield, and pass back what time remains, because I promised to use very little time.

The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. BOX. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I seem to be somewhat in the minority on my delegation on the subject of this resolution. My good friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILSON] stated that there are people in his district who were in dire distress. I state there is no district that has had any greater financial depression than the district I represent. The gentleman says there are children in his district that now have no shoes. Well, I have a few 80-year-old children in my district who never had a pair of shoes in their lives; they wear sandals and are of the Spanish proclivity. But I am in favor of extending this relief to the starving women and children of Germany. Now, it has been urged that this is unconstitutional. I am not a constitutional lawyer. [Applause.] But there was passed a resolution of this character in 1812 by the Congress, granting aid to a foreign people, that had such distinguished and able constitutional lawyers as Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, Daniel Webster, Haynes, of South Carolina, Pinckney, of Massachusetts, great outstanding statesmen and lawyers of that day, who, I think, were sticklers for the Constitution, and who were pretty fresh from the making of that great instrument, and I am willing to take their judgment. Now, my colleague from Texas, my good friend [Mr. BLACK], in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota that the people in Minnesota were reveling in plenty—and the gentleman did draw a picture of great bounty—says his constituency in Texas were not so fortunate, and some in dire distress, and many have not enough milk for children, and so forth. Now, let me state to my friend and colleague from the great farming section of Texas that I trust he has no children there who are greatly undernourished on account of lack of milk. The great livestock district I represent is long on milk.

If he has, we will ship him all the milk he wants from west Texas. We have plenty of it, I will state to my friend, both of the cow and the goat. [Laughter and applause.] And it is said by some who claim to know, my friends, that the goat milk is of great sustenance, and especially for children.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield the gentleman a minute.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I thank my colleague for that minute. This is no new thing, gentlemen. The Congress has voted aid to starving people of foreign countries many and many a time, and to the unfortunate people of our own country in different parts. If my memory does not play me false, the Government extended aid to the people of my home State some 30 years ago, when farming was new and an unprecedented drouth such as was never known before or since visited the lower Rio Grande section, which is now one of the most productive farming sections of the State. Take the report here of our own General Allen, who is fresh from there, and read it, gentlemen, and it depicts a story of suffering on the Ruhr that would make the heart of any red-blooded American respond in sympathy and the eyes fill with sympathetic tears. I think he said it—someone did in these hearings on the bill—that unless aid was extended 20,000,000 people, mostly women and children, in Germany would perish in six months. I have no sympathy for the war lords of Germany—the Hohenzollerns and the Ludendorffs—but they will never suffer, perhaps now are supplied with every luxury and revel in plenty, while the poor peasant class are starving at their very door. We did not war, my friends, on the women and children of Germany; they are now suffering from the sins of a tyrannical bunch of monarchs who never had a sympathetic thought for the plain people. Read the letter here of Mrs. Wilson, the wife of the great war President, who urges this aid. Pass this bill and I tell you—outside of the humanitarian feature that moves me—and it will have a beneficent and wholesome effect upon world peace; peace and good will toward all mankind, and also tend to reestablish our great pre-war export trade with Germany. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute and a half to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Lowrey].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for a minute and a half.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I shall hardly try to discuss this question in a minute and a half. I have no criticism for the men who in the tenderness of their hearts want to contribute to the relief of suffering women and children, and I have no abuse for those who interpret the Constitution in a way different from the way I view it. But I do resent both for myself and others the insinuation that we are acting through bitterness or hate toward Germany.

If I have time to tell the story, I want to say that my friend Tucker, of Virginia, handed me $100 the other day and asked me to carry it down and settle a little matter for him at the bank. As I went down I came across a tramp with a cancer on his face and a crippled leg. I gave the money to the tramp and came back without going to the bank at all. I should have been heartless to do otherwise.

If Tucker did not relieve that poor tramp voluntarily, it was clearly my Christian duty to appropriate to that cause the money committed to me for the other purpose. You know, of course, that is a fable. First, you knew that when I said Tucker had $100; and second, when I said he trusted it to me [laughter], then you knew it was a plain lie. [Laughter.] But it has a moral in it; and the moral of that fable shows why some of us can not conscientiously vote for this bill.

I want to see the American people come with great liberality to the relief of these suffering Germans. Let the Red Cross, the churches, and other great benevolent organizations bring the appeal strongly to the hearts of our people, and, true to our American traditions, they will respond as they have so recently done to the calls of Japan, Russia, and the Near East.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Upshaw].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, speaking very frankly, I thought when I entered the House to-day I would vote against this measure, upon the strength of some of the arguments that have been laid down. But I have not been able to get away from the music, the beauty, and the truth of the words that I am going to read to you from a little Testament that I love to carry along in my pocket. I read from that wonderful epitome of the Christian graces, the twelfth chapter of Romans:

Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head.

Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

A nation needs this sacred injunction as much as an individual.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is not recommending that we send them "a drink"?

Mr. UPSHAW. Pshaw, no! Why, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Hull] and the gentleman from Georgia are voting together on this question. [Laughter.] This is the thing upon which I put emphasis: These suffering children are not our enemies; they are the children of worthy parents, for the most part, who are suffering from the industrial kaiserism that wrecked Germany, and that is cruel enough to see the German Government stay forever on the rocks for the sake of money in their pockets and power in their own selfish hands.

I would not vote for this relief measure if it should take a single crust from any suffering child in America. It does not do that, but it simply shows to the world that a great-hearted wealthy Nation like the United States of America is willing to reach out its hand of human sympathy to the starving children of our former national enemy. That is the spirit of that mercy which is akin to the divine.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes; I yield to you, although my time is short.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman believe that a single Member of this House will vote against the resolution on account of prejudice against the German men and women?

Mr. UPSHAW. Not at all! But I want the word to go out to the world that the United States of America that struck the blow which, according to Lloyd-George, turned the tide of victory against Germany—I want the word to go out to the world that the United States of America, in the spirit of a divinely taught humanity, has voted to send this handclasp of sympathy, wrapped in an earnest "God bless you," to the people of Germany, especially the suffering children of our former enemy. That will win Germany's heart and warm the heart of the watching world. [Applause.]

I honor my colleagues who oppose this bill on constitutional grounds, but I would like to ask them if they think it was unconstitutional for this Government to refuse to accept the Boxer indemnity from China? Surely nobody thought then, or would think now, of making such a charge. And everybody knows that the few paltry millions thus invested in China's everlasting good will has borne a golden fruitage of practical friendship that has made, and will continue to make, an increasing contribution to America's financial and ethical prosperity. Chinese students have streamed toward our American colleges and universities, carrying back American ideals to enrich the Orient—yes, and sending the trade and the fellowship of the Orient to enrich America through all the coming years. If this indemnity money had been accepted by America, it would have been just as "unconstitutional" to vote it out of the Treasury as to vote it out of our grasp back into China's heart and purse.

I count it in consonance with my constitutional loyalty to vote for any human relief that will "provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare" by bringing to us the many-sided friendship of a great national aggregation like China.

The active good will of half a billion of such militant people, as the awakened Chinese are becoming more and more every day, has been won—not by the money involved but by the benevolent attitude of the United States.

In these testing days of international volcanics I count it a great stroke of national preparedness to show the coming nation of Germany that America's heart is in the right place—as warm in peace as our arm is strong in war.

We are helping our own people by buying the German food from American farmers, and I only wish that our country that spent twenty-odd billions of dollars to help crush the military prowess of Germany would send even more now to help lift up the children of the people who are down.

Of course, we understand that the real Christian citizenship of America harbors no spirit of revenge upon Germany, but in the eyes of the unregenerate world Germany and the United States of America are regarded as enemies. It is America's priceless opportunity to show the forgiving, humanitarian spirit of the Prince of Peace.

This action to-day will electrify the world and create a zone of light around the earth in which the Stars and Stripes will shine with new and wondrous glory. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can make much of a speech in that time, so I will ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman and fellow colleagues, this resolution, H. J. Res. 180, for the relief of the distressed starving women and children of Germany, has my sympathy and no doubt the sympathy of this entire House and the American people. Much has been said on the floor of the House that Congress can not appropriate this money because of no provision in the Constitution. I do not agree with my colleagues. As Representatives of this body we know the sentiment of our constituents, which is the sentiment of the American people. This sentiment has well been expressed by many Members who favor the resolution. This is not a new proposition before the House. We have voted millions for the same character to Russia; we have done some humane work and saved the starving of Russia; we have done other humanitarian work from the floor of this House, and why raise the question against starving Germany is beyond me to conceive.

I am an American, but I also have a heart that can not ignore the appeal of suffering humanity. Millions of women and children are to-day starving in Germany. We are called upon to relieve their suffering by the appropriation of $10,000,000, not in money, but in food supplies, bread, meats, fats, milk, etc. How can we turn our deaf ears to their appeals for succor? How can we fail to respond to their appeal for the sustaining of life?

The war is over. Whatever may be our views as to that war we must agree these suffering women and starving children did not cause the war and if they could have voted on the war they would have opposed and prevented it.

Even though I still feel keenly against Germany for having dragged us into the war, the war in which my own flesh and blood, in which my own dear brother lost his life in the Argonne, nevertheless, I can not close my ears to the cry of the hungry.

The $10,000,000 of food which we shall distribute will be not only an act of great charity but a worth-while investment. This giving of food will produce a feeling of good will in German hearts which will be remembered in history and will operate to our mutual advantage from a humanitarian point of view. Also this giving of food to the hungry may even avoid a revolution within Germany.

The evidence before the Committee on Foreign Affairs fully sustains the proof, not only from what we heard said in the newspapers but what we heard from representatives from the churches, charity workers, specialists, and students of the conditions in Germany. There are approximately two million and a half undernourished, starving German children and other millions of helpless mothers. The condition has brought about not only famine but disease, and there is now ten times the former tuberculosis rate among the school children. The figures as to the number of undernourished and starving children were substantiated by Prof. Ernest M. Patterson, of Pennsylvania, and Dr. Haven Emerson, of Columbia, both specialists, who investigated and made extensive reports of the economic conditions in Germany. Professor Patterson testified—that the total number of people in Germany that are in need of more or less relief is approximately 20,000,000, or one-third of the population.

The following is an extract from a communication from the American ambassador in Berlin:

In large areas of Berlin more than 50 per cent of the children are tubercular; they are weak from undernourishment. There is less than 50 per cent of the amount of milk necessary to supply their needs and they are entirely without fuel with which to warm their homes.

Imagine if you will a mother with helpless, hungry babies suffering from tuberculosis in a home where the fire is never kindled, even during the coldest winter days. We did not fight women and children and they were not responsible for the war. Many of the babies have been born since the war. Immediate action by America both through private and governmental aid is the only hope of the children in Germany.

The great feeder of mankind, Hon. Herbert Hoover, who has fed over 20,000,000 children in 23 different countries of Europe, has endorsed this German relief resolution, and the following words which I quote from him may be found on pages 134 and 135 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Secretary Hoover. I can only feel one way about children. I have engaged a very large part of my time and energies for 10 years in remedy of famine and poverty among European children, as well as in major questions of food supply to some 23 different nations in Europe. I have felt that in the large view the real hope of recovery in the world and rehabilitation of Europe lies in sustaining the children; that it is of primary importance that we should contribute where solution can not be found otherwise to maintain the health and welfare of their children. With a record of having engaged in the relief of somewhere upward of 20,000,000 children in these 23 different countries in Europe, I could not oppose but must support provision against the undernourishment of children anywhere. I can argue very heartily on the failures of adults and the misdoings and misdeeds of the governments that bring these situations about, but I can not apply those arguments against children. Our one hope is that the next generation will be better than this one, and there is no hope if they are to be stunted and degenerate from undernourishment. I recognize the many arguments that may be brought against charitable action either by private agencies or by our Government, but I refuse to apply these arguments to children.

Again we have that soldier, honored for his heroic service in the war, General Allen, who gave this picture of the tragic situation in Germany, who testified before the Committee on Foreign Affairs in support of this resolution and recited the story of a banker and which I quote from his own remarks found on page 11 of the hearings:

General ALLEN. Here is a report from the head of the Quakers over there. Of course, this money that we collect is turned over directly to the Quakers there, who are charged with its distribution; and this is from the head of the Quaker commission in Germany.

There has recently come back from Germany a banker in Denver, Colo., by the name of Causey, who has no German blood in his veins. He stopped in Essen a day or two as a tourist; that was his intention, at least. But one morning, looking out of the window in a certain town, he saw a long line of people standing in the rain, many women and children; and he went out and found out that it was a bread line—or a potato line—and he counted those people, and found there were 2,200 of them; and when they got to their goal, the potato stand, they were allowed to purchase 1 pound of potatoes only.

And this man, a hard-headed banker, was so moved by that condition that he turned over his letter of credit to the burgomaster of that town; and since that time he has been devoting himself, in conjunction with a Dutchman and an Englishman, trying to send food and money to the Ruhr.

Now, that was quite a disinterested man; and he tells a very affecting story.

I had a letter yesterday morning from a man with whom I was associated years ago in Russia; and he refuted in Wiesbaden. He has lost most of his property. He was a large manufacturer over there, a Scotchman. And he tells a most plaintive story. I intended to bring that letter with me.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, I am surprised to see so much opposition to this worthy resolution. It seems to me in whatever light we may look at this resolution we can only come to one decision, from a practical, a humanitarian, and from a greater national point of view that this resolution should be passed. I am going to support the resolution by voting for it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one-quarter of a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. A quarter of a minute.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield that quarter of a minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to talk quite a while now, and if I can not get that I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I was granted one-quarter of a minute to voice my sentiment touching the resolution to appropriate the sum of $10,000,000 for the relief of women and children in the famine-stricken districts in Germany. Manifestly it was impossible in that brief period to intelligently tell the House why I favored the resolution, and so I asked and received permission to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

But even under that kindly authorization I shall be brief. I favored the resolution for three best reasons:

1. Because I regarded it as the call of conscience and humanity to run to the rescue of millions of unfortunate non-combatants, rendered indigent through no fault nor act on their part, but wholly as a result of a great war in which they were not participants.

2. Because I felt that by the adoption of that resolution we of America might forever establish in the minds of the people of the German Republic that in the late World War the United States did not seek the harm of the German people, but only the overthrow of a mighty military machine which was threatening the civilization of all nations by its arrogant and insolent claim of right to rule by the right of might.

3. Because by the passage of that humane resolution our own great Republic would thereby give encouragement to all people in all lands to throw off the yoke of monarchs and establish free republics, confident in the belief that our own great mother of stable republics would lend all possible aid and encouragement to sister republics in the hour of need. If the new German Republic is to live and take a place among the republics of the earth, now is the time for sister republics to so act as to give notice to the world that they will not view with approval the efforts of the combined monarchs of Europe to hamper and hinder the work of the German people in effort to build a free republic upon the ruins of the house of Hohenzollern.

And if another best reason should be needed in favor of the passage of the resolution, I assign as that reason the palpable fact that such humane action as contemplated in this vote of food to the famine sufferers in Germany must further serve to show to the peoples of the earth, and especially to the German people, that in the good heart of America there is no sentiment of bitterness toward the common people of any realm in which the masses shall arise and throw off the yoke of a monarchical oppressor. It is my fond hope, and my sincere belief, that the passage of this humane resolution will lead the world to acceptance of the fact that America never has fought for conquest, and that in peace America can and will be as grand as her armies have been glorious in war.

Mr. FISH rose.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to submit an inquiry?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WINSLOW. On some occasions like the present, help has been rendered to foreign countries through private contributions. I am reminded that General Allen, who was in Germany a long while, was going about the country undertaking to help that country for the very purpose stated in this resolution. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the undertaking of General Allen and the purposes of this resolution?

Mr. FISH. General Allen is at the head of a committee raising funds throughout this country. Up to date he has raised something like $2,000,000 from private sources. But General Allen and other members of that committee have testified that that amount is totally inadequate to take care of the present appalling situation. In spite of what has been said on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW], all the witnesses agree that there are at the present time 20,000,000 people in Germany who are living on relief, furnished mostly by the German Government, by the German cities, and by the rich people of Germany.

This small sum of $2,000,000 which has already been raised by General Allen's committee, added to the $10,000,000 which I hope we are about to appropriate, is not adequate by a long way to relieve the distress in Germany. Twice ten million is needed, and General Allen's committee has a mighty task ahead of it and should be given every encouragement.

When I introduced this measure before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I offered to withdraw it unless we could produce evidence by competent witnesses as to the tragic conditions in Germany which necessitated the supplying of women and children with food until the next harvest is ready in July. We proved to the entire satisfaction of the committee, and even to those who were against this bill, that it was necessary to supply food to these starving children if we were going to keep them alive until the next harvest.

The main issue before the House to-day is whether the United States, out of its abundance, with its granaries bulging with corn and wheat and with the accumulated wealth of the world, is willing to meet that issue, and whether we will appropriate money out of the funds of the Treasury to maintain these starving women and children. That is the real issue. We did not fight women and children and they were not responsible for the war. Many of the babies have been born since the war. Immediate action by America both through private and governmental aid is the only hope of the children in Germany.

A great many of the Members from the South, who advocated that we should go into the League of Nations, have come here to-day and opposed this resolution; a few years ago they were advocating that we should enter the League of Nations because of humanitarian reasons and because of the brotherhood of man; and were prepared to urge us to appropriate money to maintain the league and to see that the league functioned in a way that would provide relief of this kind whenever the need should arise. Yet those very men are the ones who are opposing this resolution at the present time on constitutional grounds. They would have you believe that the Constitution was framed expressly to prohibit grants of this kind; they would have you believe that the Constitution was written purposely to deny the right of Congress to afford relief of this kind, to deny the commandments of religion, and to deny the very law of God.

We have plenty of precedents in this House. In 1812 the House of Representatives appropriated $50,000, by unanimous vote, to afford relief to the people of Venezuela. In that House were such strict constructionists as Calhoun, Randolph, and others from the South, and Madison, who did as much to frame the Constitution as anyone, approved of that resolution.

And what does the court hold? The court says:

A long acquiescence in repeated acts of legislation on particular matters is evidence that those matters have been generally considered by the people as properly within legislative control. Such acts are not to be set aside or treated as invalid because upon a careful consideration of their character doubts may arise as to the competency of the legislature to pass them.

Mr. TUCKER. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. FISH. I am reading from the case of Maynard against Hill, in the Supreme Court of the United States. There are a number of other precedents of similar character.

Mr. TUCKER. Has the gentleman the case of United States against Fairbanks before him?

Mr. FISH. I have a number which I can turn over to the gentleman, and they are exactly the same in point as this.

All of us who are in favor of this resolution admit that this is not the best way to provide these funds; we all admit that it should have been done by giving Germany the right to float the loan of $70,000,000 which was asked of the Reparation Commission. But Premier Poincaré, speaking for the French Government, said he would oppose any such loan giving priority over reparations, and the Reparation Commission apparently concurred. The result is that Germany itself is not able to secure a loan and is not able to raise the money with which to secure food for its undernourished and starving women and children.

Mr. ANDREW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will yield.

Mr. ANDREW. Why should not the German Government borrow from her own people?

Mr. FISH. I thought I answered the gentleman. I said that the German Government is now providing for 20,000,000 people and that the cities are providing for all they can. The rich people are specially taxed and those of moderate means are taking care of their relatives and are taking care of their immediate circle of friends. So to-day a vast amount of the charity that is being doled out in Germany comes from German sources. Germany can not even float a loan of a thousand dollars in order to raise funds for charitable purposes because of the veto by the Reparations Commission. Is that an answer to the gentleman?

Mr. ANDREW. May I direct the attention of the gentleman from New York to the testimony of Dr. Haven Emerson, who says that a government such as Germany has to-day receives 80 per cent of its income from the wage earners and is not in a position to tax the rich people of Germany. The gentleman will find that on page 61 of the hearings.

Mr. FISH. The German Government does tax the rich, and taxes them far more than we tax them, and they are taxing them in a special way to raise money for this specific purpose. I refuse to yield any further.

If we are going to err on the question of constitutionality, as has been stated here in the House by so many Representatives from the South, who claim that we can not do this because of the Constitution; if it is a disputable constitutional question—and I do not believe it is—but if it is, let us err on the side of humanity, on the side of charity, and on the side of peace.

This bill will do more than the League of Nations has done in five years to promote peace and good will in the world. [Applause.] It is sound policy, high policy, American policy. We recognize our obligation to help others, reserving, however, the right to decide on the time, place, and the method. It will not only save the 2,000,000 children who are starving as we stand here discussing this bill but it will promote peace and good will and friendly relations with Germany. What is needed in the world to-day is the triumph of the gospel of good will over hatred and revenge. There can be no peace in the world until there is a desire for peace based on conciliation, cooperation, and justice. This is an investment in humanity and civilization, and its dividends will be good will and peace. It is certainly upholding our own interests and public welfare if we can save the lives of these German children and at the same time secure the friendship and gratitude of 62,000,000 people by a small appropriation of this kind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. FISH was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 180) for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany.

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute grain, fats, milk, and other food-stuffs adapted to the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the President, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution: Provided, That the President shall, not later than December 31, 1924, submit to the Congress an itemized and detailed report of the expenditures and activities made and conducted through the agencies selected by him under the authority of this joint resolution: Provided further, That the commodities above enumerated so purchased shall be transported to their destination in vessels of the United States, either those privately owned or owned by the United States Shipping Board.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "foodstuffs," insert the words "for and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "not later than" and insert in lieu thereof the words "on or before."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall not say much on the amendment. Whichever way it reads, whether you leave the words as they are now or put in the words suggested by the amendment, the effect is identically the same. I want to say that I shall support this resolution, and it is remarkable how men differ in what they see. Possibly, at the same time that my friend from Massachusetts was traveling in Germany, in Berlin and through the Ruhr, I possibly was going around through the Ruhr on another road. It was told us then by responsible parties who gave us information that could not be denied that men and women and children were dying of starvation in the month of October last in the Ruhr. Everybody who saw that country and saw the condition of those people must have realized and must have known that before March of this year there would be thousands and tens of thousands of innocent children and innocent women who would die of actual starvation. During last October in the great city of Essen of 500,000 people the stores were open in the morning an hour and in the afternoon an hour with nothing to sell and nothing with which to buy. The same thing was true in Bochum. We saw these things with our own eyes. You would drive down through some of these large cities on a street a mile and a half in length and you would drive through 100,000 people, mostly men and women on the street, and not see one smile, but see them hungry, emaciated, and practically all they had in their arms was a little bag of potatoes or perhaps some carried a little bit of bread. There is no need to disguise the facts. What has been said in this testimony is true and the testimony does not contain all of the facts.

This is not a question of who started the war. These women were not responsible, and God knows these children were not responsible; and should we not now, under the circumstances and conditions, place this meager sum at the disposal of the Government so that the produce we now have that is going to waste may be given to these people to prevent them from starving. Humanity demands it. A great big-hearted Government requires it and it ought to be done, and now is the time to do it.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. Has the gentleman ever made this powerful and pathetic appeal to the humanitarian side of men in the churches or before any public audiences anywhere in America since he came back?

Mr. RAKER. My dear sir, I do not have to make it in the churches and before other people. This is the place to make it, among the men who are to vote upon this question to-day. [Applause.] We have the right to use our good, common sense. We have the right to use our judgment. We have the right to vote upon matters that will affect our people, and I want to call your attention to the fact that I am voting for this not only from a humanitarian standpoint but I am voting for it as a matter of defense. I want to tell you to-day, sir, that the German people have for the last year stood between Bolshevik Russia on one side and France on the other, and this will do more to prevent the spread of Bolshevism than this country could accomplish by spending a billion dollars; and why not do it when the opportunity comes. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, a deplorable situation, unprecedented in modern times, confronts one of the great nations of the earth. Incredible as it may seem in this day of abundant food production, an entire nation is in the clutch of a famine which threatens to exterminate millions within the next three months.

Germany is slowly starving. According to Secretary Hoover, three-fourths of her people never get enough to eat, and from ten to twenty millions of her vast population are in dire danger of starvation, and must perish unless help can be secured.

The children particularly are in imminent peril. An adult may pass through a period of starvation and with proper care may regain former health and return to normal without serious injury. But a child denied food during the critical period of growth and development even if it survives is permanently stunted, both physically and mentally.

In industrial centers of Germany 90 per cent of the children have not seen milk for months. In certain areas of Berlin 50 per cent of the children under the age of 14 are tubercular, a condition practically unknown in Germany before the war and due solely to undernourishment and lack of proper clothing and heat. The American Ambassador reports that children are being reared in homes in which fire is never kindled on the coldest winter days. Forty per cent of the German children go to school without any kind of breakfast, and 90 per cent to 95 per cent are habitually underfed.

One baby out of every ten born alive in Berlin is given over to an institution, because the parents are unable to provide food for it. I quote from the testimony of one of the witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs during the hearings on this resolution:

I went into the hospital at Gelsenkirchen. Everybody had been turned out of the city hospital excepting very little children, and if I should bring a picture to this committee of what I believe to be the typical condition of the children in the Ruhr there would not be a moment's hesitation about relief from America. I saw little children, 120 in one hospital, suffering from tuberculosis; and bear in mind that tuberculosis among little children between the ages of 2 and 6 was not known in Germany before the war. It is simply due to malnutrition and absence of food. I saw little children suffering from tuberculosis, screaming that day, that Sunday afternoon, a sight that I will not forget to my dying day. One little mother had a 4-months old baby that weighed seven pounds when born. I saw the chart over the bed as in every German hospital. It weighed 6 pounds that day on her breast. The mother came 30 minutes every day to feed it from her breast to supplement the hospital feeding, and for three weeks at a time she could not get a single drop of milk. She had to feed the baby with warm tea. I went among other babies and nurses in the hospital and with the doctors in the hospital, and I am satisfied that children of Gelsenkirchen and Essen were literally starving to death, babies that were not born during the war.

General Allen, commander of the American Army of Occupation in Germany, testified before the committee that after an exhaustive investigation he estimates two million German children are now dying of starvation.

It is an appalling situation, and all the more distressing because it falls upon a people hitherto among the most provident and prosperous in the history of the world, a people who have been noted for the care and affection with which they reared their children.

It is a condition which appeals at once to the heart and conscience of every compassionate man or woman regardless of creed or nationality, and it is a duty as well as a privilege to alleviate such wholesale suffering and destitution and to render a service to a stricken people which will contribute to their welfare and the welfare of the world for generations to come. A generous and immediate response to this urgent call of distress is not only an economic necessity but a humanitarian obligation, and will in future years bring us greater returns in European markets, as well as in the gratitude of a distressed nation and the respect of the civilized world, than any other investment the American people could possibly make.

And while we do not contribute to the relief of misfortune with any hope or expectation of any immediate material reward, it is pertinent to note that in purchasing food and sending it to the people of Germany we are literally casting bread upon the waters, which will return to us almost immediately many times the amount invested, in the form of increased prices for agricultural products.

One of the most difficult and important questions now before the Nation and the Congress is the relief of distress in the agricultural districts of the United States. According to the Secretary of Agriculture, practically one-fourth of the farmers of the country are bankrupt, and the other three-fourths, with the merchants and bankers and professional men who do business with them, are facing imminent financial disaster.

The losses of the American farmer are largely due to the depleted purchasing power of Europe, notably of Germany.

Germany has consumed less than 6 bushels of bread cereals per capita during the past year as compared with 9 bushels per capita in 1909-1913. (United States Department of Agriculture, January 28, 1923.)

That is a decreased consumption for the past three years' period of half a billion bushels. The same situation obtains as to meat and meat products.

To restore the pre-war per capita of supplies of meats and fats it would be necessary for Germany to import over 1,000,000,000 pounds of beef, over 2,000,000,000 pounds of pork, and about 1,000,000,000 pounds of animal fats. (United States Department of Agriculture, January 28, 1923.)

In the same period American markets have been glutted with farm products which Germany needed, but could not purchase, partly because of disorganized industrial conditions, partly because of the occupation of the Ruhr, partly because of depreciated currency, and partly because the high tariff wall erected by America prevented her exchanging her manufactured goods for American farm products.

It is universally conceded that if some satisfactory disposition could be made of this surplus, or at least a part of it, the question would be solved. Various remedies have been suggested, but I wish to call attention to the one which is now before us, namely, that we give away this surplus or a part of it to those who need it most.

At first glance that may seem a radical and startling remedy, but it has been suggested by a very eminent official, no less an authority than the Secretary of Agriculture himself.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ANDREW) tells us that neither the President nor any member of his Cabinet approves this bill. That may be true, but one of the members of his Cabinet, and the one best qualified to pass upon the subject, has specifically approved, if not recommended, this plan before this bill was ever introduced. On November 30, 1923, the Secretary of Agriculture, in a report to the President, rendered after long and painstaking investigation, said:

The sale or gift of a substantial part of our surplus wheat to countries which are not able to buy, and which would therefore take out of the ordinary channels of trade and competition the wheat sold or given, would unquestionably have a helpful effect upon the domestic prices of wheat. (The Wheat Situation, p. 74.)

The effect of such a plan is neither conjectural nor speculative. It is not merely a theory or an untried experiment, but has been proven by actual trial to be both practical and effective.

In December, 1921, Congress passed a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for Russian relief. The bill was approved by the President December 22, 1921. Soon after its approval the United States Grain Corporation began the purchase by bids of wheat, corn, and other foodstuffs. The effect was immediately reflected in the price of both wheat and corn. On January 1, 1922, the average price of wheat in the United States as reported by the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture was 93.3 cents per bushel. Purchases continued during January and February, and on March 1 the price had risen to $1.169, an increase of 23.6 cents per bushel. This is all the more impressive when the seasonal trend of prices is considered. The trend of prices for the last five years is shown in the following table, supplied, with the exception of the prices for 1924, which are not yet available, by the Department of Agriculture:

Year.	January 1.	March 1.
1919-20.....	231.8	226.6
1920-21.....	149.2	147.2
1921-22.....	93.3	116.9
1922-23.....	105.6	105.1
1923-24.....	97	96

² March 17.

It will be observed that each year, with the significant exception of the year 1922, the price of wheat declined from January 1 to March 1. The only exception it found in the period during which wheat was being sent to Russia, and during which, instead of a decline, there was an increase of almost 25 per cent.

A like effect was noted for the same period upon the price of corn. The first purchases of corn for the Russian relief made in the last week of December, 1921, were at an average price of 62 cents per bushel f. o. b. steamer, while at the end of February and the first of March, 1922, the corresponding price ranged from 70 to 72 cents per bushel, an increase of more than 16 per cent in the price of corn brought about by America's contribution to Russia.

The passage of this resolution will not only relieve the situation in Germany, but it will also dispose of sufficient of our surplus foodstuffs which now depress our domestic markets, to repay in the increased prices of farm products and in the consequent prosperity of the farmer, many times the amount which the resolution appropriates.

If we can by this one measure relieve the distress of a sister nation and at the same time contribute to the prosperity of our own people its enactment will constitute an achievement of the highest statesmanship.

The passage of this resolution means health and in many instances life itself to suffering women and children. In the darkest periods of the mediæval ages when the light of chivalry shown faintest the care and protection of women and children was the supreme test of knighthood. Surely in this enlightened age we can not measure modern civilization by any less humane standard or criterion.

When the Nazarene gathered about Him upon the hills of Judea such as would be fed, physically as well as spiritually. He gave particular care and attention to the children. He recognized no distinction of sect or creed or race or people or nationality. The children of friend and foe, of Pharisee and Sadducee, of Jew and Gentile were alike the object of His tenderest care and solicitude. Through all the tenor of His discourse the regard and reverence for childhood is stressed and emphasized and reiterated. Surely, now as then, inasmuch as we minister unto the least of these we minister unto Him.

When a ship goes down at sea the safety of the women and children is the first consideration. In all the long annals of American heroism, on land or sea, in peace or war, there is no finer figure than that of the gallant Captain Jason, of the Atlantic, giving his life belt that a child might live, or the knightly Major Butt forming the line of embarkation on the reeling deck of the Titanic. Can we invalidate that splendid record here to-day?

It is the glory of America that she has always protected the weak; that she has succored the distressed and ministered to the helpless and the unfortunate. She has never yet, at home or abroad, from French, Belgian, Slav, Russian, or Japanese, failed to heed the call of humanity, and I can not believe that she will fail now.

The salvaging of starving women and children is not a question which admits of debate. I trust this resolution will have the approval and indorsement of the House by a decisive majority. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on this resolution and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I propose to offer and I ask that it be read for information in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks that an amendment that he proposes to offer be read in his time. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment has not been disposed of.

Mr. JONES. I am asking that this amendment, which I propose to offer, may be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "board" insert the following proviso: Provided further, That in purchasing such grain and other foodstuffs as are herein provided for, preference shall be given wherever practicable to purchases from farmers and cooperative organizations of the farmers.

Mr. JONES. I regret that I can not support the bill. But I believe we are trustees for other people's money, and that we have not the right to vote funds out of the Treasury for other than governmental purposes.

Mr. Chairman, however, the temper of the House indicates a determination to pass the measure, and if it is to be passed I do not see why anyone should object to giving preference to cooperative organizations in making purchases. There are many cooperative organizations which have millions of bushels of wheat. They are struggling to better the condition of the farmers. There is other wheat in the hands of speculators, and it seems to me that while it is being done, these organizations should be favored in every possible way. Therefore I think it is advisable to go to the cooperative organizations in making these purchases wherever it is practicable.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Here is a world commodity; how is a provision of that kind going to be of any benefit to the individual farmer? The gentleman certainly does not expect the Government to pay more than the market price?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am talking about cooperative associations. Here is an easy market for great quantities of wheat. Why not give first chance to the cooperatives?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman want the Government to pay cooperative organizations more than it will pay anyone else?

Mr. JONES. There is a surplus of wheat in this country and there always is a surplus of wheat in this country. Somebody must ship that wheat away. The United States Government is going to do that if this resolution should pass. Does the gentleman prefer that the Government should buy from speculators or from cooperative organizations? Does the gentleman object to the Government buying from cooperative organizations? We have wheat growers' associations all over the United States. There is the Northwestern Wheat Growers' Association, which operates in the gentleman's own country. There is the Texas Wheat Growers' Association and the Oklahoma Wheat Growers' Association, and a number of others that have wheat that they must dispose of somewhere, and while doing this, why not give them the benefit of it?

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WEFALD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that right in the city where the gentleman from Minnesota lives, Minneapolis, the Government representatives could buy from a cooperative association, the Cooperative Equity Exchange, one of the largest in the country.

Mr. JONES. Does not the gentleman favor that?

Mr. WEFALD. I do.

Mr. JONES. Why should the Government go out and buy from some speculator when there are cooperative associations all over the country which have surplus products in their hands who are praying for relief? Why not give them relief?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report a further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 12, after the word "transported" strike out the words "to their destination," and in lines 12 and 13, after the word "vessels" in line 12 strike out the words "of the United States, either those privately owned or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VAILE: Page 2, line 2, after the word "Treasury" insert the words "derived from miscellaneous receipts and."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment would be to make the resolution read: "There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury derived from miscellaneous receipts and not otherwise appropriated," and so forth, instead of simply providing generally that the sum is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury.

I offer this amendment as a friend of the resolution for the purpose, if possible, of avoiding an objection which seems to me to be well founded in point of law. It has been urged here all day that, as a matter of constitutional principle, you can not devote money raised by the compulsory process of taxation to the relief of people of another country, no matter how urgent their need or how strong its appeal to our sympathies. If that objection should be raised in court by a taxpayer and carried to the Supreme Court of the United States it seems to me very clear indeed that the court would say we could not do it. Of course, we hope and believe that no such objection will be made. We hope and believe that the American people in their abundance and prosperity will not grudge a sum equal to less than 10 cents per person to save the innocent victims of a cruel war—noncombatants who did not cause and who could not have prevented the war, many of whom did not know of it, and many of whom were born after it was ended.

But, to be perfectly frank about it, the reason why we are going to adopt this resolution to-day is not because we think it is constitutionally sound. It is because we are sure it is morally sound. And consequently we hope that the people whom we represent will not be disposed to insist upon their strict technical rights.

We are voting for it, or at least I am, because we can not endure the thought of millions of little children, whose lives are of so much importance to the future of civilization, dying from starvation, while our own children are plentifully fed and warmly clothed. We are voting for this donation because we dare not reproach ourselves in the future with the vision of emaciated little bodies and weakened faces, aged children looking piteously at death inflicted upon them from no fault of their own.

But for these very reasons I would like, if I can, to remove what seems to me a technically correct ground of opposition to this resolution. Let us consider what happens when a man does not pay his taxes. Upon his final inability to do so his property is sold. His house may be sold over his head. And it seems to me that the Supreme Court would be bound to hold that a man's property can not be sold in order to obtain money any part of which is to be used to meet the needs of people in another part of the world, and consequently that the resolution in its present form is beyond our power to pass. Is there any way in which that can be avoided? The Government has some revenues not derived from taxation, and they amount to a very considerable sum.

Those revenues are the revenues known as miscellaneous receipts, and they include, among other items, such things as interest on foreign debts, sales of Government property, receipts from the public domain, such as sales of public lands and timber, canal tolls, fines, forfeitures, penalties. Of course the ultimate burden on the country is just exactly the same, whether you take it from that class of funds or from funds raised by taxation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Under the gentleman's amendment there would be no danger of penalizing some man who did not pay his taxes.

Mr. VAILE. He could not be heard to say that his property was sold for the purpose of taking money, even a part of the amount, for the benefit of some other people. Of course it comes out of the Treasury finally in the long run, but that particular objection is gone. I hope the committee will agree to this amendment. I believe it is sound.

I am in favor of this resolution, and I am sorry that the argument has been made that we should pass it because any particular class of people in the United States, even the farmer, will derive some benefit from it. It seems to me that cheapens this gift, if we are going to make it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman think there is enough money in the Treasury of the class referred to to meet this obligation?

Mr. VAILE. There was $658,000,000 in that class of funds last year. There will be at least that much next year, none of it raised by taxation. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. VAILE) there were—yeas 29, noes 125.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 2, line 14, after the word "Board" strike out the period and insert the following: "Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, for the spring of 1924, to make advances or loans to farmers in the boll weevil, drought, and flood stricken areas of the United States, where he shall find that special need exists for such assistance, for the purchase of seed, feed, food, and for actual farming expenses, not including the purchase of equipment, as he may find need for the cultivation of farm lands within the said State, not to exceed in any instance the sum of $6 per acre. Such advances or loans shall be made upon such terms and conditions and subject to such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe, including an agreement by each farmer to use the money obtained by him for the production of such crops as the Secretary of Agriculture may designate. A first lien on the crop to be produced from money obtained through this loan or advance made under this act shall, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be deemed sufficient security therefor. All such loans or advances shall be made through such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate, and in no instance shall any portion of funds obtained through the administration of this act be used for the payment of obligations other than those incurred under the regulations as provided by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration and in accordance with the provisions herein contained.

"Sec. 2. That for the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000, to be immediately available, and not more than $15,000 may be used in the District of Columbia by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that; the Clerk does not need to read further. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks sufficient of the amendment has been read to convince the Chair that it is not germane, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment—

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "Board" strike out the period and insert the following: "Provided further, That this act shall take effect only if and when the adjusted compensation measure for the American veterans of the World War shall become a law."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida made a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I desire to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order?

Mr. FISH. I do; that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in that connection, if the Chair will permit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is an extremely close question of parliamentary law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this joint resolution, and I do not want to see it postponed, but I do believe that there should be an orderly progression of legislation. I do not believe this House is justified in granting this relief to a foreign nation with which we have been lately at war until we fulfill a great moral obligation due to our own people. [Applause.] This amendment is directed to the time when this act shall take effect. I do not believe a point of order can lie against its germaneness. I shall not cite any particular authority because if it is not apparent to the Chair that this is a limitation on the time that the act shall take effect, even though that time may never occur, then I do not want to argue the matter further. I shall vote for this measure whether this amendment is adopted or not, but I hope that this Congress will be as scrupulous in the discharge of its duties to our own people as it is quick to respond to the needs of suffering humanity in the lands beyond the seas.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to be heard on the amendment. I cite the Chair to an authority that ought to be controlling because it is a decision by the present occupant of this Chair. It is a limitation under the decision of the Chair pure and simple, and I cite the Chair to the decision which the Chair rendered the other day on the stop-watch proposition. If the Chair will read that decision he will see it is a limitation and it is a proper limitation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course the argument of the gentleman from Texas falls absolutely flat because he is classing this as an appropriation bill which it is not, and it only applies to an appropriation bill.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to offer the observation also that this is not an appropriate amendment for the simple reason that it would defeat the will of this House. If it developed that the will of the House is in favor of German relief and if this amendment would be incorporated and then the soldiers' adjusted compensation would never become a fact, then the will of the House would be defeated, and any amendment that is designed to defeat the majority purpose of a bill is not germane to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment is in order for this reason: Regardless of its being an appropriation bill, and granting that it is legislation, this Congress has the right to make its legislation effective at any time it sees fit. Suppose, instead of saying "when the bonus bill passes," this amendment said, "Provided, however, That this act shall not become effective until the first day of July, 1924." Would not that be in order? Would it not be within the power of this Congress to fix the time when this act shall become effective?

Mr. BLANTON. Just like the reclassification act.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I submit to the Chair, Would it not be proper for this House to provide in this bill that it should become effective on the happening of any contingency that this committee might see fit to name? Would it not, as suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], be in order to provide that this bill should not become effective until the adjournment of this Congress?

And is it not possible for this Congress to fix the effectiveness of this legislation upon any reasonable contingency? The only hypothesis upon which it could be reasonably contended that that is not true would be on the hypothesis that the bonus bill would never become a law and that it is not intended that it shall become a law.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman think it would be in order to amend the resolution by providing that it shall not be effective until a subsidy has been granted to American ships?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Certainly it would. It might be a foolish amendment, and in that case I think it would be foolish; but the House can vote down a foolish amendment. That does not go to the question of the power of the House. It goes to the question of the wisdom of the amendment.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does not the gentleman from Texas recognize the difference between a limitation of a certain event and an uncertain event?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes; certainly. This is not a limitation. This is fixing the time when the act shall become effective. It has been held on several occasions that limitations on appropriation bills providing that such and such an appropriation shall only become available upon the happening of a contingency are in order. If that can be done by a limitation why can not it be done on a legislative bill? If such a limitation on an appropriation is germane, why is not a similar provision as to the effective date of legislation germane? Does not the rule as to germaneness apply to an appropriation bill as well as a legislative bill? If the limitation is germane, this provision is germane. If this amendment is not germane, how can the limitation on an appropriation be germane?

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, following the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to an ultimate conclusion, you might provide that this bill should not obtain until the passing of any or all of the bills now on the Calendar of the House. It is an absolute absurdity. You might just as well add that this bill shall not take effect until the tax reduction is accomplished, or until this or that or every bill on the calendar has become a law, or until agricultural relief is given, or something of that sort. I think that after a moment's thought the Chair will say that such an amendment can not obtain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. This House joint resolution is for the relief of distressed and starving women and children of Germany. It deals with that question exclusively. At the end of the resolution the gentleman from Ohio seeks to add a proviso, as follows:

Provided further, That this act shall take effect only if and when an adjusted-compensation measure for the American veterans of the World War shall become a law.

The Chair will state that he finds himself in some doubt because of two decisions which at first blush seemed to him to be conflicting. I think, however, upon analysis and some thought, that there is a distinction, which I shall endeavor to point out. The War Department appropriation bill was before the House on June 24, 1922, with Speaker GILLET in the chair, and an item had been read for the continuation of work on Dam No. 2 on the Tennessee River, at Muscle Shoals, Ala., to be immediately available, $7,500,000; and to that Mr. HUNDLESTON offered a substitute, an amendment which had the following language in it:

Provided, however, That this appropriation shall not become available until such time as the Congress shall have taken final action on H. R. 11903, and not then if the subject matter of said bill is enacted into law in a manner as will result in the consummation of contracts for lease and sale of the Government Muscle Shoals properties to Henry Ford: Provided further, That this provision shall not operate to postpone such availability later than January 1, 1923.

To that amendment Mr. Stafford, of Wisconsin, offered a point of order. The Speaker said during the discussion:

The Chair will state that it seems to the Chair very clear that the provision carrying out the purposes of the Government as to contracts for lease or sale is legislation. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that.

After further discussion the Chair ruled on the matter. The Speaker said:

The Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that this is purely a limitation on the appropriation. It does not make an appropriation available that the present law does not make available. It simply makes it contingent on a future event, and that seems to the Chair is merely a limitation. The Chair overrules the point of order.

That would seem, on the face of it, to be authority, but there is this distinction: That was an appropriation bill and the Chair was deciding the matter on a question of limitation under the limitation rule, and not on the question of making the appropriation available on the passage of some other act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the Chair for just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is there not this main distinction: That that was a bill which provided for a definite appropriation while this bill is merely an authorization?

The CHAIRMAN. There was that distinction and this other distinction which distinguishes it from the case before the committee now, namely, that the subject matter—even if it had not been an appropriation bill—covered by the limitation was another act relative to the same subject matter.

Now, then, afterwards, on the 9th day of February, 1923, with Mr. Speaker GILLET in the chair, a bill was before the House, and a motion to recommit was made, as follows:

Mr. O'CONNOR moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: At the end of the bill insert: "This resolution shall not go into effect until the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is repealed."

A point of order was made against it by Mr. Stafford, and Speaker GILLET sustained the point of order. The Chair thinks that is authority, and sustains this point of order.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas and Mr. BURTNESS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURTNESS: Page 1, line 3, after the word "distribute," strike out "grain, fats, milk, and other," and also the word "foodstuffs," in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the word "wheat."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to correct, first of all, the misstatements which have been made on the floor time and time again this afternoon to the effect that the appropriation of $20,000,000 to Russia— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Mr. Chairman, I could not get any time in general debate, and I think gentlemen will be courteous.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Claims have been made that those appropriations were made out of the Federal Treasury and at the expense of the Federal Government. That is not the fact. I have here the act which was approved on December 22, 1921, a portion of which reads as follows:

The President is hereby authorized to expend, or cause to be expended, out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, a sum not exceeding $20,000,000—

And so forth.

Reference has also been made to the amounts that were furnished the different Balkan countries. I sent for that act and have it here. It was approved on March 30, 1920, and provided for the sale of 5,000,000 barrels of flour to relieve populations in the countries of Europe suffering for lack of food and the act gave permission to take securities in exchange for such flour. Under the terms of that act the sales were made and securities were accepted, not one of which has been paid, amounting to $56,858,802.49. So on those two items alone you made possible contributions of almost $80,000,000 to starving peoples in Europe, and at the expense of whom? At the expense of the taxpayers of this country? Not at all, but at the expense of wheat farmers of the United States. How did that become possible? Simply by reason of the fact that Congress authorized a law by which, by one stroke of the pen, the price of wheat to the wheat producers of the country was reduced practically $1 a bushel, and thereafter through the operations of the Grain Corporation—in fact, after the war was over—you continued buying the farmers' wheat at a price which was much lower, as everybody concedes, than the price would have been if the ordinary laws of supply and demand had operated.

The Grain Corporation therefore made profits, and out of such profits on the purchase and resale of wheat you have made these contributions in the past. This being the case, and if I further prove to you by the testimony of the German authorities themselves and by the testimony of Secretary Hoover that the thing that is really needed over there in Germany to-day is 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, is it not a fair proposition under those facts and circumstances which I will bring before you if I have the time, that when you are going to expend $10,000,000 for further relief over in Europe, that you at least buy from the farmers who, at their own expense and at their own cost, made it possible for you to expend $80,000,000 for these charitable purposes in the past? Should they not have your first consideration?

In the request made by the German Government to the Reparations Commission for a $70,000,000 loan you will find a request for two purposes only. Those purposes are wheat and edible fats. You will find that formal request at page 5 of the hearings. Secretary Hoover in his testimony states specifically that those two are Germany's needs. Read the Secretary's testimony and you find that the fats have been procured by importations larger than in 1922, leaving the present great need that of grain for bread.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

[Mr. BURTNESS was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the Record.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 2, line 14, after the word "board," insert the following proviso: Provided further, that in purchasing such grain and other foodstuffs as are herein provided for, preference shall be given, wherever practicable, to purchases from farmers and cooperative organizations of farmers."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES.]

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES) there were—ayes 165, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERHILL and Mr. CONNALLY of Texas rose. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is not a member of the committee entitled to recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is right.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UNDERHILL: At the end of the bill insert: "Provided further, that the German Government appropriate and expend an equal amount for the same purpose."

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment speaks for itself. If they care for their people, let us make this a 50-50 proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERHILL) there were—ayes 84, noes 180.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: Page 2, line 14, at the end of the paragraph, insert: "Provided, That this act shall not become effective until January 1, 1925."

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] make a point of order?

Mr. SNYDER. I withdraw it.

Mr. RANKIN. I make a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. I make the point of order, which is the same as the point of order that was made against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a point of order at all.

Mr. RANKIN. And I also make the point of order if it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment. I just wanted the Chair to rule on it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this resolution and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I had an amendment at the desk which I wanted to submit; and I ask that I be permitted, as I am not allowed to talk, to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that under the rules the committee can not shut off debate, as long as there are amendments, until the amendments offered have at least been debated five minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the rules to that effect. It is still within the power of gentlemen to offer amendments after all debate has been shut off.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the understanding of the Chair, that at any time during the consideration of a bill by the Committee of the Whole a motion could be made to close debate.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. After there has been debate, Mr. Chairman; and there must be some debate on the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there are no pending amendments. The gentleman makes the motion, and it certainly applies here. There is nothing in the rules that excludes it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has corrected me, and states that the rule is that after five minutes' debate on the section the motion can be made; so I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to read that rule. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: Page 2, after the last word of the bill, insert: "Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective only upon evidence to the satisfaction of the President that the sum of $10,000,000 shall have been paid into the treasury of the National Committee for Relief of German Women and Children from private sources and contributions."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment. I do not think that is germane to this bill.

Mr. Chairman, this proposition, while nominally the same, is not directly related to the subject matter of the bill. It would render ineffective perhaps the passage of the bill. It seems to me it comes under the ruling that the Chair has previously made. It is not properly related to the subject matter, and therefore is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that this amendment is different from the one the Chair ruled upon. It reads as follows:

Provided, That the provisions—

The Chair assumes that it means the provisions of this act—

Mr. McSWAIN. It means the provisions of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Reading that into it, it says:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective only upon evidence to the satisfaction that the sum of $10,000,000 shall have been paid into the treasury of the National Committee for the Relief of German Women and Children from private sources and contributions.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may modify the amendment by writing into it "to the satisfaction of the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, after the last word of the bill, insert: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective only upon evidence to the satisfaction of the President that the sum of $10,000,000 shall have been paid into the treasury of the national committee for the relief of German women and children from private sources and contributions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence whatever that there is such a committee to relieve German women and children.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all debate on the resolution is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is speaking upon his point of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to call attention to the fact that nowhere in the resolution itself, either directly or indirectly, does it appear that there is any other fund being raised or attempted to be raised to supply foodstuffs for the German starving children. How could you satisfy the President that such a fund had been applied to the extent of $10,000,000? We do not know that such a committee exists, and to make this resolution take effect on a contingency that the President shall be satisfied that somewhere, somehow, by some kind of agency, a similar contribution has been made is as ungermane to the bill as anything upon which the Chairman has ruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on this matter. The joint resolution provides that the President is authorized to purchase foodstuffs and to use therefor $10,000,000, which is to come out of the Treasury of the United States; to carry out the provisions of the act he is to purchase foodstuffs, distribute them through his agencies to the hungry and needy women and children in Germany, and report the same to Congress, and to transport the same in American ships.

Now, this amendment provides that the provisions of this act shall be effective only upon evidence to the satisfaction of the President that a sum of $10,000,000 has been paid into the treasury of the National Committee for Relief of German Women and Children from private sources and contributions. Thus far in the consideration of this act that is the first mention, the first notice anyone has had that there is such an organization as a National Committee for the Relief of German Women and Children. The contribution proposed in the act is an appropriation from the Federal Treasury, with which Congress has a right to deal and with which it is legislating. The amendment seeks to take notice of acts of contributions from private sources. It introduces the new and foreign matter to the bill at issue, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, in line 4—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that if the gentleman is going to offer an amendment, under the rules that amendment should be in writing and read from the desk by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from Minnesota will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: Page 2, line 14, after the word "Board," strike out the period and add the following: "Provided further, That the President may transport the commodities in vessels other than those owned by the United States Shipping Board, if in his judgment it can be done at a lower cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEFALD: Page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "$10,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$20,000,000."

Mr. WEFALD. Mr. Chairman, having moved the adoption of the amendment to raise the amount of the relief for starving women and children of Germany from $10,000,000 to $20,000,000, it is needless to say that I am for the bill. I have carefully watched the debate and the trend of opinion among the best-informed gentlemen who have taken part in the debate has been that $10,000,000 dollars will not be enough. When the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who is the author of the bill, closed the general debate, he stated that "$10,000,000 is not adequate by a long way to relieve distress in Germany; twice $10,000,000 is needed." It seems to me that the author of the bill should have asked for a larger amount. I understood, after debate started here to-day, that some of the gentlemen interested were going to try to amend the bill in this particular, but as no one else found courage to do this, I felt in honor bound to do so by proposing to double the amount of the aid, but found no opportunity to do it until after debate was cut off.

My reasons for amending the bill so as to double the amount of the relief is that if 20,000,000 people in Germany are starving or needing relief we can not very well donate anything less than a dollar apiece. It has been said in this debate that there are 2,000,000 babies that are suffering for lack of food, especially milk, and if there are that many babies suffering there are that many mothers also that ought to have assistance.

I have met some young men who came as immigrants from Germany last summer and heard the stories these simple, truthful, young rustics had to tell. They were tales of horror, and these young boys will always have stamped upon their faces the shadow of the greatest tragedy that has ever come upon any nation. I have seen photos of starving German children who were as gruesome to look at as any that came out of India in a time of famine. The newspaper and magazine articles that we read, telling about Germany's economical recovery and her hidden wealth are written to order and for pay. We are yet under the spell of French propaganda and will continue to be so as long as our stock gamblers have money invested in European, especially French, stocks and securities.

German childhood to-day is the greatest tragedy of the ages. The small northern countries of Europe, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries have done all they could with their slender means ever since the close of the war to ameliorate the awful conditions that German childhood suffers under. Norway and Sweden have from year to year taken whole shiploads of German school children and given them a rest and vacation and sent them back to their school work in the autumn like new beings. These Scandinavian people not only gave their money, but took these little unfortunates into their homes, where—so I have been told—these little unfortunates after a while were able to laugh, which they had not done for years. Can we then give less than a few dollars?

On the question of the relief itself I wish to say that as to the question of constitutionality the best legal minds in the House are divided. The great old Roman from Ohio [Mr. Burton] has convinced me that the Constitution is no bar to this gift; but in the discussions on the question of constitutionality I have been forcefully reminded that eloquence and tenderness of heart do not always go hand in hand. I am sure that the founders of our Constitution never intended that we should shut our hearts against suffering and that only our reason and not our conscience should be accountable to God who gave us both.

Aside from humanitarian reasons, I vote for this appropriation because I want to save our national conscience. We are partly guilty for the terrible conditions in Germany to-day. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Moore], one of the few real big men here, has expressed the truth when he said, "the fact of suffering is undisputed. It has come mainly since France went into the Ruhr; and that adventure of France has not met, so far as I know, with any serious opposition from the United States." Indeed, it has not. Our bankers have loaned France money—our people's money—and our administration says it approves of it. This money is, of course, to be used to bolster up the cause of France in the Ruhr, and to prolong, not only the suffering of Germany, but the misery of Europe as a whole. I am in favor of telling France what the American people think about it. Let such a note follow upon the heels of this gift.

Some platitudes have been uttered in this debate about Germany having stood between the rest of the world and Russian Bolshevism. Such talk is pure bunk. If Germany has served any purpose at all, in her stricken condition, as a buffer between the rest of the world and any military or social danger to our civilization, it has been that of being a carrion upon which the French vulture has been so busily engaged in feeding that it has sought no other prey.

I hope this act of mercy that we are now undertaking here will come to the stricken people like a ray of hope from heaven and as a word of warning to the French. Let it go over there as a protest against the negroes and barbarians that the French have saddled upon the Germans in the Rhineland and the Ruhr. There is nothing but hatred where the dumb suffering has not calloused the soul so it can not even hate. France is taking from Germany her coal and iron and pays for it with insults and fresh crimes.

I quote from a recent book by Francesco Nitti:

If the impressionable minds of the French and Belgian children are being filled with savage hate, and the memory of past crimes is being kept alive among them, the German teachers might be excused for going to any lengths to keep alive, not past crimes, but present ones. The negroes and barbarians who have been stationed on the Rhine to humiliate the Teutons are a spectacle to which they can not close their eyes. To be sure, the Germans broke the treaty of 1839 in regard to Belgium, but the Entente has broken, in regard to Germany, not only all their promises and pledges but even the treaty of Versailles of 1919. It is true that the Germans shot Miss Cavell, and the deed to their shame will not be soon forgotten, but the negroes in time of peace have assaulted with impunity the German women on the Rhine, who have died of shame and anguish.

The Germans have as much right as anyone else to remember their martyrdom. Of course the Germans, during the war, confiscated property of conquered people, but this was done as a military measure, whereas the events in the Ruhr, which are independent of any military or industrial program, aim at establishing a hegemony, both in war and in peace, through obtaining control of the coal and iron of the whole continent.

Hatred is kept alive in the boys of Belgium and France by reminding them of the sins of the Germans in the war, but hatred blazes in the souls of the German boys at sight of daily crimes, and is further inflamed by constant privations. Amid all these old and new hatreds, what will Europe become? Must the uninterrupted sequence of crimes and murders continue as in the family of Atreus? The endless chain of wrongs is forged, and each link is the inevitable result of the last.

Where such conditions exist there must be disorder, unemployment, and starvation.

Will it not be worth ten or twenty millions to throw a ray of hope into such despair as there must be? We were a party to the treaty of Versailles, and we stand idly by and see it violated and thrown to the winds.

In these days, right here in our own country, there is much talk about the superiority of certain race strains. We are shaping our immigration laws with a view to admitting into our country more of the so-called Nordics, and less of other strains. From Germany, in time, will come a great number of the immigrants we will be willing to admit into our country. For that reason it is fitting that we now do something that those who shall be our future citizens will be fit and worthy of admission. Under the present law she is entitled to send us 67,607 persons per year, and no matter what census we adopt as a basis for a new immigration law, she will be allowed to send us a number of her sons and daughters that can only be exceeded in number by those that Great Britain and Ireland will send us.

According to the census of 1920 we had 7,259,902 persons of German blood foreign-born or of foreign or mixed parentage, or about 20 per cent of the total foreign stock population. When you think of this it brings the German crisis much closer to us; makes it something akin to our own problem, as far as saving lives of innocent women and children and as far as upholding the ethics of the Christian religion goes. I think of what a national asset our people of German blood have been to us and what it has cost Germany to rear and fit for usefulness the sturdy sons and daughters she has sent us.

Then I, for one, am willing to vote this little donation toward milk for German babies because of what Germany has been to world civilization and progress, in spite of what she has sinned, for which she has suffered so much and yet will suffer. The cause of humanity is the cause of the whole world. I could find no fitter word to close this, my justification for my vote on this matter, than by again quoting from the war premier of Italy, Francesco Nitti, when he says:

We would blush if we were accused of treating a half-savage race in the way we are treating Germany. We believe that everything is lawful against the Germans; that is, against the people which in 150 years has given to the world the greatest thinkers, from Kant to Schopenhauer, the greatest artists, from Beethoven to Wagner and Goethe, and has made the greatest contributions to science and industry.

Even if there is in the persecution a keen desire to torment those who were most loved, there is also a fervent hope of depressing and disintegrating the German nation.

What kind of future are we preparing for our children? What will be our own future? As we make our bed, so we shall have to lie in it. We shall not find peace at home again in any nation, or prosperity, or healthy conditions of life, until this sad period of ignorance and brutality has passed away.

The cause of Germany and of the other vanquished peoples is henceforward the cause of the whole world, for on that cause alone depend the peace and the economic prosperity of the whole earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 1, Line 7, after the word "Germany," insert the words "and Porto Rico."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that clause read with the amendment in it.

Mr. BEGG. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the House joint resolution may be read with his amendment included within it, as if it had been agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SARATH. I object.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. BEGG. It is not germane. This is relief for Germany.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman's point of order comes too late, business having intervened.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it does not come too late. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS of Florida: Page 1, line 5, after the word "grain," add the word "fuel."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House Joint Resolution 180 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is ordered by the rule. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them on grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. When is the motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida demands the reading of the engrossed copy of the House joint resolution.

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill H. R. 5073, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it a complete report?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is except as to one item, the Bright Angel Trail.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it the gentleman's intention to call it up in the morning?

Mr. CRAMTON. It must be first acted upon by the Senate. I shall call it up on the first opportunity.

RELIEF OF WOMEN AND CHILDREN OF GERMANY.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, at the request of my friends, I withdraw my demand for the reading of the engrossed bill. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays. Obviously there is a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 97, answered "present" 3, not voting 91, as follows:

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. SULLIVAN, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present." He is against the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLOOM, who is in favor of the bill. I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the gentleman from New York I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT TO COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce the following appointments to committees:

Committee on Aircraft: LAMPERT, VESTAL, PERKINS, FAUST, REID of Illinois, LEA of California, PRALL, O'SULLIVAN, and ROGERS of New Hampshire.

Treasury Department: MCFADDEN, KING, STRONG of Kansas, STEAGALL, and STEVENSON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GARNER of Texas, on account of illness.

To Mr. QUAYLE for an indefinite period on account of illness.

To Mr. TYDINGS for to-day on account of official business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1982. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., its successors and assigns, of a line of railroad across the northeasterly portion of the Fort Snelling Military Reservation in the State of Minnesota;

S. 2113. An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton; and

S. 75. An act for the relief of the Cleveland State Bank, of Cleveland, Miss.

GERMAN RELIEF RESOLUTION.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this resolution provides:

That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute grain, fats, milks, and other foodstuffs for and adapted to the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the President, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution.

And so forth.

The war with Germany has ended. Germany is vanquished, and our action to-day should in no way be affected by the feeling which we entertained toward Germany during the war. Of course we do not favor the course pursued by the German Government during the war, nor in many instances by the German Government or the German people since the war. These, however, are matters beside the question. We are to-day confronted with a condition. It matters not what the cause, the facts are clear and undisputed.

There are approximately two and one-half millions of undernourished and starving German children and millions of helpless mothers in Germany to-day. These mothers and these little tots are not responsible for the war. They are the victims of that conflict.

The statistical statement compiled by the American Friends headquarters in Germany tells us that 2,500,000 German children are to-day starving and that the tuberculosis rate among school children is appalling. Competent authorities who have made a careful investigation of the situation in Germany to-day tell us that 20,000,000 of people in that country are in need of relief at this hour. Mr. Houghton, a former Member of this House, and now the ambassador to Germany, tells us that in large areas of the city of Berlin more than 50 per cent of the children are tubercular; they are weak from undernourishment, and there is less than 50 per cent of the amount of milk to supply their needs, and that they are entirely without fuel with which to warm their homes. Picture, if you will, these starving and freezing women and children in Germany, and then ask yourselves the question: Is there a man or woman in this land, understanding the situation, who would hesitate for a moment to grant all the relief possible?

I think the spirit of America is exemplified in the action of our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who introduced this resolution, and who is its principal sponsor on the floor of the House. Germany had no more bitter foe during the World War than this same [Mr. FISH.] He was a typical American then; he served his country well on the field of battle, and was decorated for gallantry in battle. He is a typical American to-day. America has never fought women and children, we have ever extended a hand to the helpless. We do not want to punish the innocent for the wrongs of others, and we will in this hour of distress extend the hand of friendship to this people.

When the women and children of Russia were starving but a few years ago America did not hesitate to come to the rescue, even though those starving people were living under a government which this country would not recognize, and even though conditions were brought about by that very form of government, nevertheless our people recognized the condition and regardless of the cause unhesitatingly gave of their wealth.

Gentlemen on the floor of this House, who have visited Germany within the last few months, have told us of the appalling conditions, and I can not understand how anyone present could listen to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana. [Mr. WOOL] and then vote against this resolution. I am unable to fathom the mind of the man who attempts on some constitutional ground to escape doing what seems to be the demand of humanity in this instance.

It is true that this money which we are appropriating is the people's money and that we are the representatives of the people, and I for one am proud to say that I believe that the people of the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress will approve of this action. Those people did their duty during the war and they have hearts. Conscience is not dead. We are not being generous; we are only preventing starvation.

One of the great economic questions in the country to-day is to find relief for the farmer. There is not a lack of foodstuffs in this country, there is a surplus, and the question with which we are now wrestling is how to dispose of that surplus in a way that will give the farmer a fair price for what he produces.

When this country bought $20,000,000 worth of wheat and corn to send to the starving Russians, the effect was immediately felt by the farmer of the country when he was relieved of this surplus. Ten millions of dollars spent at this time for the purposes provided in this resolution will not only save millions of lives, but will at the same time give a measure of relief to our agricultural interests.

Then, again, if we are viewing this matter from a selfish standpoint, it seems to me that the effect of this action will be most wholesome upon the relation between these two countries.

Before the war it was not a disgrace to be of German extraction, and a reconstructed Germany means much for the generations of the future. America has no desire to annihilate the German people. We appreciate their value and their worth and our purpose should be to encourage and not discourage. General Allen, of the American Army, who has made a survey of the needs of Germany at this time, in speaking before the committee, said:

They are a virile people who have contributed greatly to the progress of civilization, and the world, it seems to me, needs them with their strength restored. Moreover, owing to the instability of international friendships, this gesture of humanity, such as the people of the United States are now showing, should prove a valuable asset for our Government in its future international relations.

General Allen's words do honor to the Nation and are worthy of its best traditions.

The hope of the starving children in Germany depends upon our action here to-day, and I for one shall cast my vote on the side of humanity, and in so doing I believe I speak the hearts and the souls of the American people.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to the passage of this House Joint Resolution 180, providing for the appropriation of $10,000,000 to be invested in foodstuffs and transported by the President for the relief of the distress amongst the German people. My opposition does not grow out of lack of sympathy for those unfortunate people. In fact, I have for them an intense and genuine sympathy, and I had a great sympathy for them even in 1917. I felt then, and I still believe, that the masses of the German people were innocent victims, having been caught in the whirlpool of imperialism and militarism and were powerless to assert themselves. I do not question the sincerity of the motives of those who sponsor and vote for this resolution; but I do very respectfully submit that, though the motive may be good, the method is bad. It is another example of using the wrong way to do the right thing. Undoubtedly many of the German people are in distress. Undoubtedly some of their great barons of imperialism, having heaped their millions upon millions both during the war and since the war, and those selfish individuals, drunk with their great power of rotten riches representing the distillation of blood and tears of millions of German men and women and children, do not open their hearts and purses to their own fellow countrymen. Undoubtedly gentlemen are right in saying that we, the victors, should be generous and we should show a liberal spirit by deeds of merciful ministrations. But to appropriate the money from the Federal Treasury is not the proper way to represent the hearts of the American people, and it will not produce the same effect upon the minds and hearts of the German masses as a voluntary donation would.

THE APPROPRIATION IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The money collected by taxation in all forms, but especially from the income tax, is exacted under penalties of law from the American people, and this fund is impressed with a trust and that trust is that the Congress shall appropriate that money for public purposes and for nothing else. If we can appropriate money to feed suffering people in Russia, and in Germany, and in China, and in Africa, and in Japan, and anywhere, then we can appropriate money to promote the cause of foreign missions in China, and to advance the cause of education in Africa, and to promote the financial progress of Europe, and to encourage the study of art in Paris. When we leave the definite path of the Constitution and cease to acknowledge that the public purpose for the common defense and general welfare of this country alone is the guide for appropriations of tax money from our Treasury, and having left this well-beaten path to go into strange fields, then there is no limit that can be set, and when that begins then tax reduction will hardly be a dream.

IMPEDES AND PREVENTS MELLON PLAN.

The plan of tax reduction begins with the fundamental proposition of reduction of appropriations. Until we start to reduce and cut down the money appropriated from the Treasury, it is worse than idle and more foolish than folly to talk about tax reduction, and, in fact, most of this talk about tax reduction has been devoted to the matter of tax shifting. It has been a discussion as to how some of the burden may be taken from the shoulders of one man, or one group, or of one class and cast upon the shoulders of another. No great commanding voice has yet pronounced the fundamental solution of the problem, which is the reduction of appropriations. Now here is the chance of some of the ardent enthusiasts of the Mellon plan to render the country a genuine service. Let some of these so anxious for tax reduction go into the courts and ask for an injunction to restrain the President from expending this money for the purpose as stated on the ground that it is a violation of the trust by Congress and is a conversion of the funds belonging to the people and is a void and illegal effort to take money extracted by penalty of law from the people for a specific purpose, to-wit, for the common defense and general welfare, and to divert that money to other and unlawful and unconstitutional purposes.

THE RESOLUTION IS UNAMERICAN.

The foundation of Americanism is individualism. Taxes are paid grudgingly. When America goes with her gift of mercy and generosity to the German people, it ought to be such a gift as will bless the giver and the receiver. To tax for the purpose of manifesting a spirit of generosity is destructive of generosity. The way to have done this was to organize a great national committee and then to enlist the assistance of all the churches and of all fraternal societies and of all Y. M. C. A.'s and of all Y. W. C. A. bodies and of chambers of commerce and put on a nation-wide campaign that would speak from every home and hamlet, from every town and city, from every farm and factory, from the heart of the whole American people to the heart of the whole German people, the thought that the Americans do not now and never did entertain any malice toward the unfortunate masses of the German people. Woodrow Wilson spoke truly when, in his great war message, he proclaimed in effect that we were to set out upon a war that would result in the betterment in the long run of the German people themselves, and all of his war messages constituted a powerful appeal to the civilian population in the German nation, reminding them that we were fighting for human liberty, and therefore for German liberty, and that the German people, along with other people, would ultimately be the beneficiaries of our mighty crusade for democracy. Undoubtedly the German armies had not been defeated in the field on November 11, 1918. Undoubtedly the morale of the people back home was broken and the Government and the army felt that they no longer had the support of the civilian population, and realizing this they felt that defeat in a military way would come inevitably, and therefore they should seek for the best terms possible before final destruction. But if the civilian population had continued to support in a loyal way the Government and the army, though the Germans would undoubtedly in the end have been defeated in the field, it would have taken at least a year longer, because the Germans were on the defensive and the Allies must expose themselves in order to advance, and the German machine guns and riflemen and artillery and gas would have snuffed out the lives of perhaps 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 more of the Allies before final surrender. We need to show these masses of the German people in a certain and substantial way that we are their friends and that so long as they shall continue to be the friends of freedom and be loyal to liberty and devoted to democracy, then we shall continue our friendship.

MY AMENDMENT TO DOUBLE DONATION.

For the purpose of real generosity, I offered the following amendment in the nature of a proviso at the end of the resolution:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be effective only upon evidence to the satisfaction of the President that the sum of $10,000,000 shall have been paid into the treasury of the national committee for the relief of German women and children from private sources and contributions.

It is manifest that my purpose was to lash into activity the latent individualism of America. We are losing our old true personal independence, and to that extent we are losing our pristine greatness. We are encouraging a disposition to rush to the Government for everything. Even private and denominational schools and colleges and universities are not relatively as important as they were a few decades ago. Private enterprise in elementary education is practically a thing of the past. And yet I am one of those who still believes that the denominational colleges of this country, though small in number of students, and weak in finances as many of them are, have contributed an incalculable blessing to the building up of the citizenship of this Nation. Such a campaign for voluntary contributions as I formerly mentioned and as would be necessary by my amendment in order to raise the additional $10,000,000, would be a blessing to the American people themselves. It would root out the war prejudices that still cling in the minds and hearts of our people. It would teach everywhere the brotherhood of man. It would develop an international perspective among our own people. It would be a great factor for peace in the future.

If now the gentlemen from New York (Messrs. FIAM and LaGUARDIA) claim that this resolution as proposed would do more for the cause of peace in one year than the League of Nations could do in five years, then I think I am safe in saying that the American people, by a great voluntary movement, such as that they employed to raise money for Red Cross purposes during the war, would raise this money to relieve suffering amongst the women and children of the very nation against which we were but little more than five years ago actually fighting in the field, would do more for the cause of permanent peace, and do more to eliminate those passions that finally flame into war, in one year than 10 such resolutions as that under consideration could do, even if each of them appropriated ten times as much money as the one under consideration does.

In other words, $1 given voluntarily, but speaking the same sincerity that the "widow's mite" spoke, would do more for the cause of international peace and of world understanding than $100 extracted from the unwilling pockets of the protesting taxpayers and appropriated unconstitutionally and illegally from the Treasury.

THE FITZGERALD AMENDMENT.

This amendment proposed, in effect, to postpone the appropriation of the money contemplated by the resolution until after the ex-service men in the American Army and Navy should have had their compensation adjusted, and thus should have received a recognition in an official way of a normal obligation toward them by the American Government and people not heretofore discharged. In this connection I produce a letter expressing fairly and reasonably what is undoubtedly the sentiment of an overwhelming majority of the American people on the subject of adjusted compensation written by F. Gentry Harris, a prominent attorney at Spartanburg, S. C.:

SPARTANBURG, S. C., March 10, 1924.

Hon. J. J. McSWAIN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McSWAIN: I notice through the press that the bonus question will probably come up in the House soon.

As an ex-service man I want to give you my opinion on the matter, and I believe it is the opinion of a great majority of the men in this section who served in the war. I am talking now for the privates and not for the commissioned officers who received a fairly adequate compensation in the Army. If you will pardon a personal allusion, it will give you an insight into my viewpoint: I entered the Army as a private at $30 per month. I was then getting a salary of $1,900 per year in civilian life. I could have stayed out altogether on account of a blind right eye. And, also, just 10 days before I went to camp I was offered, and urged to accept, a job which would have paid me $1,800 per year, as chief clerk of the registration board here in Spartanburg. I thought over the matter for a day and night and then decided that I had rather serve in uniform in camp as a private at $30 a month than to wear civilian clothes at a time like that and hold down an easy job at five times the salary. And if the bonus is not granted I shall never be sorry of my choice. But the feeling of satisfaction that such a course now gives me does not pay grocers' bills and does not pay debts that I could have paid long ago if I had accepted the better job. I think there are thousands of other boys who did the same thing in the same spirit. And you and I know full well that without that spirit in the individual heart and mind there would have been no volunteers and conscription could never have been enforced with enough success to combat such a menace as confronted the world in 1917 and 1918.

Since getting out of the Army in March, 1919, I have married and now have two young Americans started on their way. It is my fondest hope for them that in man's estate they will stand ready for any sacrifice to keep Old Glory floating triumphantly in its battles for justice and humanity. But with how much more ardor can I train them to this attitude if I know that the Government they serve will in a measure remunerate them for material losses suffered in that service.

I will state frankly that up to a few months ago I was opposed to granting any bonus; but upon a more careful study of the subject I am convinced that it is the thing to do. Our country is prosperous, and it only seems fitting that our Government should show this much appreciation of the boys who kept her, as well as the whole world, secure from the threat of imperialism.

From reports in the papers some of the leading Republicans are against the measure; and if I am correct, the present administration is opposed to it. We are trusting you Democrats, together with the red-blooded, fair-minded Republicans, to put the thing over in spite of the opposition. I don't believe any Member of Congress will regret his support of this measure. The ex-service men are fast coming into positions of influence in this section, and I presume in all other sections of our country.

You are no doubt very busy and an answer to this letter is not especially expected; but if you feel so inclined I should appreciate a line telling me whether or not you are in favor of the bonus.

Very cordially yours,

F. GENTRY HARRIS.

A LESSON FROM THE WAR.

If the American people learn properly and apply one great lesson that has been taught by their participation in the World War, then their mighty investment of forty thousand million dollars in treasure and 300,000 wounded and disabled men and 75,000 thousand men killed, then this great sacrifice will not have been in vain, but will prove a blessing to posterity to the remotest generation. That lesson is that never again should the profiteer in time of war be permitted to put his hand into the Treasury of the war or of a private citizen. Consequently, it is the duty of this Congress and of the American people now, while the memory of the piratical practices of the selfish profiteer is still fresh in the minds of the people, to put legislation on the statute books to keep him from resuming his nefarious business when the next war breaks. It is, furthermore, our public duty, while many of those who served in the war Congress are still here, to give us the benefit of their experience and observations. Furthermore there are persons, such as officers in the Army and Navy and those who were officers in the civilian departments of the Government, and especially those who were connected with the War Industries Board, to give us now the benefit of their advice so that our legislation may be bottomed on actual experience and look to a practicable and workable solution of that all-to-be-desired principle that in time of war "equal burdens for all and special profits to none."

ONE AMERICAN LEGION POST TACKLES THE PROBLEM OF PEACE.

At Clemson College, in South Carolina, an institution of about 1,000 students, where all cadets are required to take four years' military training, there is an active American Legion Post, and at their meeting on November 7, 1923, resolutions looking toward discouraging the spirit of militarism and toward spreading the principles of brotherly love and mutual understanding among the nations were adopted, and I here insert those resolutions as worthy of preservation and dissemination:

INTRODUCTION.

For a long time the members of Clemson College Post, No. 42, American Legion, have felt that if the world is to have peace and if the last war is to be a war to end war, then some steps other than and different from those already taken must be now advanced. The resolutions printed below are the product of much thought and were adopted only after careful consideration. It is the sense of this post and others who have made a study of these resolutions that they offer the only real rock-bottom solution of the greatest problem now before the world. Disarmament, limitations, conferences, etc., must follow and not precede the course suggested in the following:

"Resolutions of Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion.

"Whereas in the recent World War we fought against the antiquated system of national rivalries which foment war, and thought that at the end of that struggle some means would be devised for settling international disputes by process of law based upon justice among nations; and

"Whereas that thing seems not to have come to pass, in spite of the efforts made to that end, but instead the old system of suspicious, war, and national rivalries in trade and armament is continuing, although the very existence of civilization and of whole peoples depends on displacing this system with a better, and this after five years of reconstruction; and

"Whereas the American Legion has gone on record on numerous occasions as favoring a judicial procedure in settling all international disputes; and

"Whereas Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion, having considered the foregoing facts carefully, and realizing that the accomplishment of the thing for which we fought and which made our sacrifices seem worth while is still in the indefinite and uncertain future, has come to the conclusion that the only way to make the realization of our objects sure is to further in every way possible the education of all peoples to the fact that war is unnecessary, illogical, and can be dispensed with: Therefore be it

"Resolved by Clemson College Post, No. 42, of the American Legion, That we do all in our power at all times to further this end and that we urge all peace-loving people throughout the world to do likewise; be it further

"Resolved, That we consider the only safe basis for permanent peace to be that spirit of brotherly love and mutual understanding among nations which will insure a full measure of justice to all nations; be it further

"Resolved, That we suggest the following concrete activities as being among those suitable for this purpose:

"1. Believing that the existence of permanent peace depends upon the proper education of the coming generations along these lines, that we urge writers and teachers of history and allied subjects to guard against anything which might create an unfriendly spirit in the minds of their readers and pupils toward any other country than their own; and

"2. That we urge the International Sunday School Lesson Committee to set aside at least one Sunday per year for the consideration of world peace and human brotherhood, and request ministers of the Gospel to devote one or more sermons per year to this theme; and

"3. That this post establish an annual prize or series of prizes for the best essays produced on this topic by any pupil in the local schools, and that we urge all Legion posts and post auxiliaries and all interested organizations in all counties to do likewise; that we urge our State Legion to give a similar series of prizes open to entries throughout the State; that we urge the National Legion to make some phase of this topic the subject for the annual essay contest; that we urge the National and State Legions to work out a series of prizes for college students, to include, if practicable, prizes given in each college, so as to draw out as large a number of entries as possible; and that the widest publicity be given these things.

"4. That we subscribe for the American Legion Weekly for each room in the local schools seating pupils of the sixth grade and above, and urge all other posts to do likewise.

"5. That we urge the American Legion to attempt to associate itself with the other World War veterans' associations, including those of former enemy countries, and all other societies which will cooperate in the adoption of an international slogan to the general effect that war is not inevitable, that it can be prevented without the sacrifice of the national honor of any country, and that the time is ripe for such prevention, such slogan to be selected as the result of a world wide contest, and that it appear upon the first cover page of every issue of the American Legion Weekly and of as many cooperating journals as possible.

"6. That we urge the national Legion to require each post in its annual report to make reply to the question, 'What have you done during the past year to further the cause of world-wide peace?'

"7. That we urge all posts and other public-spirited organizations to adopt those or similar resolutions with a suitable plan of action and to present this topic on suitable occasions; be it further Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be filed with the papers and other records of this post; that a copy be sent to the National and all State headquarters, to the American Legion Weekly, with a request that it be published, to every Legion post in South Carolina, to our representatives in the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the South Carolina State Legislature and the Congress of the United States, to the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of South Carolina, to the President of the United States and his Cabinet, and to such other individuals and organizations as this post may from time to time direct."

THE PLAN OF ACTION.

In furtherance of the provisions of the foregoing resolution, this post on the same date as the adoption of the resolutions also adopted a plan of action putting the provisions into specific form. This plan of action, on the execution of which the post is now engaged, is briefly this:

1. Offering of three prizes in the local high school for the best essays on the subject "How can permanent peace be achieved?"
2. Subscription for the American Legion Weekly for each room in the local school seating pupils of the sixth grade and above.
3. Getting in touch with the other posts in adjacent counties with the idea of getting county prizes offered similar to the above.
4. Getting in touch with department headquarters with the idea of getting similar prizes offered in other schools and in the colleges.
5. Having these resolutions and plan of action printed for distribution.
6. Reading the resolutions and plan of action at our annual armistice day banquet, November 12, 1923.

We request all Legion posts and other interested organizations or individuals to give this their careful study. We suggest that the matter be brought up at one meeting and be acted upon at a later one. If you feel as we do about these things, we urge you to adopt these or similar resolutions, with a suitable plan of action, and do all you can to further the peace idea.

THE WAR IS NOT OVER.

While the actual fighting at the front has ceased, or suspended, the war itself, the clash between nations, the struggle to carry on, is not ended and will not be ended until every grave heaped up to cover fallen soldiers shall have sunk to the level of the common sod; until all scars shall have disappeared; until all sorrow shall have been assuaged; until the last sick and diseased and bruised soldier shall have been buried out of sight; until this vast debt of $23,000,000,000 shall have been paid and until the damage inflicted upon civilization itself shall have been repaid, and a conservative estimate of the time necessary to do these things is 100 years.

TRIUMPHANT DEMOCRACY.

Though in reality and fundamentally the war did become a clash between the ideals of selfish hereditary class government on one side and of free and popular democratic institutions on the other, yet, as was inevitable, the full fruits of triumphant democracy have not been realized and may not be for 100 years. The laboratory of history is vast and the processes of reaction in her crucibles are slow, but they are inevitable and inexorable. The student of history is not disturbed by the dictatorship of a Mussolini and his fanatical Fascists in Italy. The evolution of Bolshevism in Russia he recognizes as but a passing phase of social evolution. The disturbances in Spain and in Greece and the political instability of old England, the mother of freedom, and the absolutism in France and demoralization in Germany, the student of history recognizes as the fevers always incident to a major surgical operation. The great net result is that the people of all nations, great and small, have now the freedom to prescribe their own governmental institutions. If these people, suddenly set free, for a time choose Bolshevism, or militarism, or capitalistic despotism, or proletariat demoralization, or political confusion, that is but an incident to the cause of freedom itself; it is but the evidence of their freedom, and if we believe in the Declaration of Independence and if we believe in the perfectability of human nature, and if we believe in the development of human intelligence, then we must believe that these free nations will finally settle down to such orderly governments as will best suit their own economic and social circumstances.

"DOUBTING THOMASES" IN AMERICA.

And yet even in America, the homeland of Thomas Jefferson, where the people are supposed to believe in and even to reverence the principles of the Declaration of Independence, we find some highbrow persons outside of Congress, railing at Congress, which is the expression of free institutions, and charging that Congress is degenerate and debauched and degraded and inefficient. These hypercritical and hypersensitive Americans claim that the Senate of the United States has been degraded by the adoption of the seventeenth amendment, requiring the Senators to be elected by the people in their respective States. If the Senate has become degenerate by the election of their 96 Members during the last 12 years by the people, then to what indescribably low degree of degeneracy must the House have descended during these 135 years of history, during which time all of its Members have been elected by the people every two years. If contact with the people will pollute the Senate in 12 years, then by the same token, the foulness of political degeneracy in the House would be indescribable in words and mathematically incalculable. We take no stock in such sentimentality. The legislative department of this Government is Congress, and it always has been clean, and always will be clean, because of the fact, and only because of the fact, that it must go before the people for election and reelection, and because all its acts are done in the open, where all men may hear and are recorded upon the printed page, where all men may read. It is this "pitiless publicity" that prevents corruption and preserves integrity and perpetuates official honesty.

IT IS NOT UNCLEAN TO EXPOSE UNCLEANNESS IN OTHERS.

The Congress, and especially the Senate, has spent some highly valuable time ferreting out and bringing into light of publicity some of the secret machinations of the executive and administrative departments of this Government. It is not only highly valuable service, but it is indispensable service. If this rottenness should continue to eat at the vitals of our Government and life, then but a few decades would measure our national existence. Furthermore, the legislative department is the only department that can perform this service. The judiciary department can not act until some one else brings matters to its attention in a judicial way.

It is unthinkable that a corrupt administrative department would expose its own corruptness. Therefore it remains for the legislative branch alone to speak the protest of 100,000,000 American hearts against wrongdoing in high places and to punish, not only by legal penalties prescribed by law and administered by courts but to punish by exposure, to hold up to public scorn by making an example for all others that will deter wrongdoing and keep the Government clean.

TRUE DIGNITY CONSISTS OF SERVICE.

It has been complained that the Congress, and especially the Senate, is no longer dignified, since they are elected by the people. It is claimed that to act as a grand jury of inquest is undignified. It is charged that its motives are not patriotic but political. It is said that we are a bunch of scandal mongers instead of lawmakers. But let me say to all such supersensitive highbrows that true dignity consists in service and not in lazy and languid performance of public functions. The times demand it, the people demand it, duty demands it, that exploitation of official station and political influence for personal gain and private profit shall stop. The conscience of the Nation demands that public office shall be a public trust, not only with regard to property and money but with regard to that influence which goes with public office and which proceeds from the people and should be restored to the people and should never be converted into cash by the officeholder. It makes no difference what was the motive behind those Members of Congress that have been digging beneath the surface that seemed so respectable, and they have discovered down there corruption and bribery and graft and breach of trust that have shocked the conscience of the Nation. I believe that the motives of all of them of both parties have been and are patriotic. But the motive for the investigation did not create the wrongdoing that was disclosed by the investigation. The malfeasance in office, the breach of trust, must have been committed, as it was months or years before Members of Congress, after tedious and laborious effort, succeeded in discovering it and forcing it into publicity by rigid, scrutinizing cross-examination.

WHY WAS LINCOLN GREAT.

People everywhere praise the memory and applaud the name of Abraham Lincoln. Why do they regard him great? He was not one of those hypocritical highbrows that fear political contamination to result from contact with the people. Whatever greatness Lincoln had, manifested itself in his trust of the people, his confidence in the people, and his devotion to the cause of the people. And yet the Washington Post's chief editorial on March 24, 1924, under the heading "The Republican Crisis," denounces the Republican Members of Congress as leaderless and without courage, and says that "paralysis has overtaken Congress." Again, "What is the matter with the Republican leaders?" Again, "Can it be true that they are trembling for fear that further revelations." Again, "Scoundrels or moral cowards—it is a hard alternative, and the people shrink from imposing judgment." Again, "There is beginning to be widespread belief that there is corruption back of the silence which the leaders fear to face." Of course, I have no authority and am under no obligation to defend the Republican Members of Congress, but I do say that I believe as a class they are clean men, largely because they are elected periodically by the people, and that they are patriotic men, and I do know that they are courageous men. Therefore, when the Post in its editorial says, "There is beginning to be widespread belief that there is corruption back of the silence which the leaders fear to face," we have a significant confession of something that the Post must know, that the people have not yet learned. This corruption is not in and of the Republican Members of Congress. It must be, therefore, where the corruption has been found already, to wit, in the executive and administrative branches of the Government. If that be so, then the American people say, "More strength to the arm of Congress." "Let the Congress go on with its inquisitorial duty." Do not stop for any cause or reason until the last faithless officeholder shall have been exposed and driven from his place, whether high or low. Dig deep into the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Expose all the transactions of the Shipping Board. Lift into the sunlight the aircraft transactions. Let the Department of Justice be judged by the requirements of justice. Let the Veterans' Bureau understand that the money—nearly $500,000,000—is collected in taxes from the people and appropriated by Congress to that bureau for the relief of the wounded and sick ex-service men of the World War and not to be eaten by overhead charges and not be consumed by corrupt and corrupting contracts.

It must be that such corruption as this is destroying the courage of the Republican Members of Congress; that must be the reason that all of them voted for the resolution to cancel the oil leases; that must be the reason that the Republican members of the investigating committees have in general done their duty to expose wrongdoing; that must be the reason that 72 Members of the Senate voted to certify Harry Sinclair to the United States court on charges of contempt of the power and privileges of the Senate while only 1 Senator recorded his vote against it. The truth is, that the editorial of the Post is a manifestation of bad temper and is outrageously unjust to the Republican Members of Congress. It forgets that these Members of Congress must go back before the people in their several States and districts for reelection this fall, and if these Members of Congress by their records here show that they would cover up crime, that they sympathize with sinners against the civil laws, that they put party above country and would defend the Republican officeholder who is clearly shown to have breached his public trust, then the people will leave these Members of Congress home and will send others, either Democratic or Republican, but above all Americans, to stand for the clean thing in public life above party. The attitude of the Republican Members of Congress toward these investigations has, as a general thing, been highly creditable to them, and they must feel deeply the insult that has been heaped upon them by that very paper that they have been led to believe would be their defender.

CHARITY BEGINS AT HOME.

Before the Government can consistently take money derived from taxes to relieve distress, however grievous in other countries, it would be becoming that all distress in our own country should be first relieved. While labor is generally employed and while capital has been making unprecedented returns, the farmers of the country have been suffering as never before by reason of the dislocation in prices. This Congress ought to institute a great program of economic legislation for the rehabilitation of agriculture. It is not class legislation to give the farmers a chance to prosper. It is of the very highest policy of preparedness. Just as we must maintain a reasonable Army and arsenals, establish a factory to fix nitrates from the air for explosives in war, and just as we must build battleships with trained crews, and just as we must have coast defenses and airplanes and submarines, so, far more essential to prosperity in peace and to victory in war is a thrifty and contented agricultural class. It is so obvious that argument seems idle.

One of the most ardent advocates of the cause of agricultural relief legislation in this Nation is the Hon. J. S. Wanamaker, of St. Matthews, S. C., and we herewith produce a brief statement from his pen relating to that subject:

SUGGESTED SOLUTION OF FARMERS' PROBLEMS.

Efforts by governmental legislation to increase the money credits of farmers at high rates of interest charged through the agencies of local banks will not solve the problem of rehabilitation of American agriculture. Such legislation will be of only temporary benefit faced with extended disaster as future pay days present themselves. The foundation of permanent reconstruction and rehabilitation must be established upon broader lines of governmental cooperation and assistance if existing distressing conditions are to be ameliorated with encouragement and hope for renewed effort in the future.

Credits for production are worthless without markets that will absorb the products of the farm at a price that will return to the growers a fair and reasonable profit. Without profitable markets there is no incentive to produce, and unless markets are sufficient to profitably absorb the present gross measure of production, the only recourse for American farmers is to begin a drastic reduction in staple crops planted, if domestic requirements are to be primarily and largely the limit of absorption. Broadly suggested, the following economic fundamental necessities are presented to your thoughtful consideration, which the Government should at once seriously consider and act upon as measures of real relief to the pending distressful and suffering condition of American agriculture:

First. Regardless of political or divergent party views, the President of the United States should be urged by his Cabinet and memorialized by Senators and Congressmen looking to the best welfare of this Nation and the world at large to assemble without delay an international conference embracing the leading representatives of the principal European countries and make an earnest and effectual effort (a) to affect a prompt and satisfactory adjustment of the German reparations based upon Germany's ability to pay; (b) urge and, if possible, secure a speedy reduction of European armament to the end that peace may be established, industry revived, and debtor nations placed in position to begin a gradual liquidation of the enormous war obligations due this country.

Second. That immediate steps be taken by every available avenue of governmental facilities in foreign countries and at home to broaden and expand the present limited exports of American staple farm products with every country engaged in international trade with the United States. Surplus crops must be exported if the present measure of production is to be maintained and increased.

Third. To bring every possible pressure to bear upon Congress to speedily enact legislation for reducing the present high and unbearable rates of Federal taxation upon the rank and file of the people.

Fourth. To urge and secure without delay a lowering of the red-count interest rates on agricultural paper for short-term loans by the Federal reserve banking system and enforce, by agreement with member banks, that such reduction shall be passed to the benefit of the borrowing farmers. Farmers can not pay from 8 to 12 per cent on past due or new loans and rehabilitate their industry from existing burdens.

Fifth. That existing inflated freight rates on staple farm products be lowered materially by action of the Interstate Commerce Commission or by effective congressional legislation. Present freight rates on many staple farm products absorb existing market values of such products between points of origin and destination. The rates on all farm products are excessive and constitute a direct charge upon the growers in the transportation of their crops to domestic markets or to the ports for foreign shipment.

There can be no permanent prosperity for this Nation without a strong, virile, and prosperous agriculture. The downfall of every great nation recorded in the past has been due to the decadence of its agriculture and concentration of wealth in social and industrial centers. The present high standards of American living, education, and refinement are as much desired and essential to the forward progress of our civilization on the farm as to those who reside in centers of population and are supported from the products of the farms. Tenantry or peasantry is rapidly increasing.

WOODROW WILSON—IRELAND AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. MINAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a speech of the Hon. Joseph T. Tumulty on the subject of Woodrow Wilson—Ireland and the League of Nations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did not a gentleman object here the other day? I would rather the gentleman would not ask this at this time. I have no personal objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Bagg objected.

Mr. MINAHAN. He withdrew the objection. He told me the other day he would not object.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Very well, then I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MINAHAN. Under leave granted to extend my remarks, I insert a speech of the Hon. Joseph P. Tumulty, at Orange, N. J., March 17, 1924, on the subject of "Woodrow Wilson, Ireland, and the League of Nations."

"History," wrote Bancroft, "is the high court of humanity, where truth must be heard and justice must be pronounced." The difficulty one finds in attempting to reach a fair interpretation and appraisal of a great man and his work is that, unfortunately, the appraisal and interpretation must come hot and be born out of the passions of the hour in which he labored and sought to achieve. The testimony as to the value of his achievements and the greatness of his career must necessarily come from those who are one-sided practitioners in that great forum of public opinion; the evidence is not fairly analyzed by the great jury nor adjudicated upon by impartial judges.

No, my friends, destiny, that inscrutable nuncio of God, works in a peculiar way its wonders to perform, and discredits the present as a safe standard by which to guide our judgments and our actions. Time, and time alone, the great solvent in the last analysis, is the final determinator.

Woodrow Wilson now being dead, in estimating the value of his life's work, his intentions, his motives, his high purposes, we are dealing with facts, hard and inescapable facts. In seeking to appraise the value of his career to the Nation and the world we are no longer affrighted or disturbed by the hobgoblins of political slogans and shibboleths, nor are we terrified by the upsets of election returns. Events in our own Nation's life and in the life of the world demonstrate that neither great careers nor grave public questions are ever permanently settled by the adversity of elections. No man can therefore be charged with politics who seeks before an audience like this, made up of all blends of political opinion, to exalt a great figure, an American, a beloved son of New Jersey, whose ideals are now making conquest of the heart of the world.

It is the sincere interest of Woodrow Wilson in Ireland and everything affecting her place in the sun that I would emphasize in my talk to you to-night. There was nothing sudden or ephemeral about it. Its basis was not political expediency. Indeed, it represented a veritable passion for freedom and liberty of men everywhere. He would not deny liberty to a nation or a people whose sons were ever ready to sacrifice their lives and expend their blood to attain it. To find the roots of that passion for liberty and freedom we are obliged to go back over the road to yesterday, where we learn how, years ago, as a candidate for office at the hands of the people of New Jersey, he laid down those doctrines of liberty and freedom out of which, in subsequent years, he attempted to weave a policy that became world-wide in its effect.

Speaking in New Jersey more than a decade ago, he said, "The Declaration of Independence was, indeed, the first audible breath of liberty, but the substance of liberty is written in such documents as the declaration of rights attached, for example, to the first constitution of Virginia, which was a model for the similar documents read elsewhere into our great fundamental charters. That document speaks in very plain terms. The men of that generation did not hesitate to say that every people has a right to choose its own forms of government—not once, but as often as it pleases—and to accommodate those forms of government to its existing interests and circumstances. Not only to establish but to alter is the fundamental principle of self-government." Woodrow Wilson believed that "when at any time the people of a Commonwealth find that their government is not suitable to the circumstances of their lives or the promotion of their liberties, it is their privilege to alter it at their pleasure and alter it in any degree. That is the foundation, that is the very central doctrine, that is the ground principle of American institutions." Continuing, Woodrow Wilson said, "I want to read a passage from the Virginia Bill of Rights, that immortal document which has been a model for declarations of liberty throughout the rest of the continent:

"That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants and at all times amenable to them.

"That government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various modes and forms of government, that is the best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety, and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and that when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal."

Again, in New Jersey, at New Brunswick, on October 26, 1910, he said:

"There is a voice that has been crying in Ireland, this voice for home rule. It is a voice which is now supported by the opinion of the world; this impulse is a spirit which ought to be respected and recognized in the British constitution. It means not mere vague talk of men's rights, men's emotions, and men's inveterate and traditional principles, but it means the embodiment of these things in something that is going to be done, that will look with hope to the program that may come out of these conferences. If those who conduct the Government of Great Britain are not careful, the restlessness will spread with rapid agitation until the whole country is aflame, and then there will be revolution and a change of government."

In a message addressed to Congress under date of February 11, 1918, he became the world's spokesman for the right of self-determination when he said:

"Self-determination is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril. I have spoken thus only that the world may know the true spirit of America, that men everywhere may know that our passion for justice and self-government is no mere passion of words, but a passion which once set in motion must be satisfied."

In San Francisco on September 17, 1919, in his last swing around the circle, arguing for self-determination for all peoples, he aroused an audience of thousands to high enthusiasm when he declared:

"I look forward with confidence and with exalted hope to the time when we can indeed legitimately and constantly be the champions and friends of those who are struggling for right anywhere in the world, and no nation is likely to forget, my fellow countrymen, that behind the moral judgment of the United States resides the overwhelming force of the United States."

And as Lincoln interpreted the aspiration of freedom of an enslaved people, so also did Woodrow Wilson define, understand, and appreciate the plight of Ireland. No statesman of modern times better understood Ireland's cause. Woodrow Wilson could not see a world permanently at peace and at the same time deny liberty to a people who for 700 years had struggled forward to that great goal. It was he, an American President, who first gave utterance to the ideal of self-determination for all the oppressed peoples of the world, a principle which, like a fire, will burn and burn and burn steadily until the hopes for liberty and freedom of struggling peoples everywhere reach consummation. And I know, my friends, that Woodrow Wilson's declaration with reference to the right of self-determination contemplated and included Ireland. His interest in and advocacy of Irish freedom sprang from a desire to help the oppressed of all lands, and the fruitage of that benevolent policy is now found throughout Europe—in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and throughout Central and South America. As a noted writer said:

"I can see no excuse for keeping Ireland in the pit while other peoples are climbing from darkness to light."

Did he not urge in every way larger measures of self-government for the people of the Philippines? In a message addressed to Congress in December, 1914, he said:

"And there is another great piece of legislation which awaits and should receive the sanction of the Senate—I mean the bill which gives a larger measure of self-government to the people of the Philippines. How better, in this time of anxious questioning and perplexed policy, could we show our confidence in the principles of liberty, as the source as well as the expression of life, how better could we demonstrate our own self-possession and steadfastness in the course of justice and disinterestedness than by thus going calmly forward to fulfill our promises to a dependent people, who will look more anxiously than ever to see whether we have indeed the liberality, the unselfishness, the courage, the faith, we have boasted and professed. I can not believe that the Senate will let this great measure of constructive justice await the action of another Congress."

Again speaking of the right of the people of Mexico to determine their own government, he said at Indianapolis, in 1910:

"I hold it as a fundamental principle, and so do you, that every people has the right to determine its own form of government, and until this recent revolution in Mexico, until the end of the Diaz reign, 80 per cent of the people of Mexico never had a look-in in determining who should be their governors or what their government should be. It is none of my business and it is none of your business how long they take in determining it. It is none of my business and it is none of yours how they go about the business. The country is theirs, the Government is theirs, and the liberty, if they can get it—and God speed them in getting it!—is theirs, and so far as my influence goes, while I am President, nobody shall interfere with it."

A distinguished Irish writer, commenting on this policy of Woodrow Wilson with reference to Mexico, said:

"Between what President Wilson has said of the Filipinos and of the Mexicans, there is to be found the root of statesmanship for Ireland."

Woodrow Wilson bitterly resented that kind of European statesmanship which insisted upon following the bloody trail and trying to vindicate a policy of force which England has relied upon for centuries to check the fine impulses and aspirations for freedom of Ireland—a statesmanship which is now shown to be futile and of no avail. Why is it that statesmen disregard the obvious lessons of history and think that force and force alone is a conquering thing? You will recall, some of you with poignant regret, that his own Secretary of State disagreed with him on the policy of self-determination. Mr. Lansing agreed (and I quote from his own book) that—

"Self-determination is as right in theory as the more famous phrase 'the consent of the governed,' which has for three centuries been repeatedly declared to be sound by political philosophers and has been generally accepted as just by civilized peoples, but which has been for three centuries commonly ignored by statesmen because the right could not be practically applied without imperiling national safety, always the paramount consideration in international and national affairs. The two phrases means substantially the same thing and have to an extent been used interchangeably by those who advocate the principle as a standard of right. Self-determination was not a new thought. It was a restatement of the old one."

Therefore Mr. Lansing vigorously criticized and held up to scorn the principle of self-determination. Quoting from his book again, Mr. Lansing said:

"The more I think about the President's declaration as to the right of self-determination, the more convinced I am of the danger of putting such ideas into the minds of certain races. It is bound to be the basis of impossible demands on the Peace Congress and create trouble in many lands. What effect will it have on the Irish, the Indians, the Egyptians, and the nationalists among the Boers? Will it not breed discontent, disorder, and rebellion? Will not the Mohammedans of Syria and Palestine and possibly of Morocco and Tripoli rely on it? The phrase is simply loaded with dynamite. It will raise hopes which can never be realized. It will, I fear, cost thousands of lives. In the end it is bound to be discredited, to be called the dream of an idealist who failed to realize the danger until too late to check those who attempt to put the principle in force. What a calamity that the phrase was ever uttered! What misery it will cause!"

Woodrow Wilson was in no way daunted in his advocacy of the right of self-determination by the direful prediction of calamity of Mr. Lansing. He was too much the student of history not to understand that everyone who seeks to raise a slumbering world from its lethargy to a recognition of the justice of humane principles, is always called a disturber, a dreamer, an idealist. Christ Himself when He sung Himself against the servitors in the temple, crying out, "My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves," disturbed the peace and serenity of the slaves of Mammon; but He did not cease "brandishing His whip of scorn high, and driving the money changers toward the door."

These cries and lamentations of Mr. Lansing were like many prophecies which, through the centuries, have put obstacles in the way of the progress of nations and peoples. The prophecy of Mr. Lansing as to the calamitous effects of the announcement of the policy of self-determination was akin to the prophecy and prediction of a distinguished Republican United States Senator, Mr. Elihu Root, who at the time that Woodrow Wilson blazed the way for financial reform in this country by the enactment of the Federal reserve law, said that, were it passed, it would bring on a period of green-backism that would result in a panic that would be disastrous to the country. These predictions were similar to those uttered by Colonel Harvey during the war—that the end of the war would finally come in a great naval contest in the North Sea. Vain and innocuous, indeed, are the predictions of those who allow pettiness to become the basis of their judgments and actions. The idealism of Woodrow Wilson won, as subsequent events have shown. It won in Ireland and Egypt and is bound to be a conquering force wherever men cry out for freedom. Thus we find the predictions of these distinguished gentlemen wrecked and shattered things amidst the ruins of a world which is slowly but gradually working its way to the light, to a realization of the things for which Woodrow Wilson fought, suffered, and gave the last full measure of his devotion.

The trouble with the gentlemen who try to forecast the future by ominous predictions is this—that when they predict, they are but feeling their own pulse which, unfortunately, is a pulse of passion, sometimes of vindictiveness. When Woodrow Wilson strove to do something great for the world, he sought to diagnose the ills of the world by feeling the pulse of the world and not his own pulse. And thus diagnosing, he reached the conclusion that force was not the determining factor in the conquest of a free people or their ideals; that those who believed in that ancient theory live in a fool's paradise. Do you not recall the delightful colloquy between Edmond Dantes and the old abbe recorded in Dumas' "The Count of Monte Cristo" concerning the effect of pressure and tyranny upon men and governments? Recalling his own troubles, the abbe says that "It needs trouble and difficulty and danger to hollow out various mysterious and hidden mines of human intelligence. Pressure is required, you know, to ignite powder; captivity has collected into one single focus all the floating faculties of my mind; they have come into close contact in the narrow space in which they have been wedged; and you are well aware that from the collision of clouds electricity is produced—from electricity comes the lightning; from whose flash we have light amid our greatest darkness."

Pressure, tyranny, adversity and machine guns can not crush out the aspirations of the Irish heart. These unkind forces seem to bring forth from the Irish the very things that make them beloved of people—poetry, song, love of the arts and sciences and a love of their land and the faith of their fathers, to which they cleave in an irresistible embrace.

Statesmen are, therefore, beginning to understand that while you may be able to kill the body of the man who spreads the truth abroad, you can not kill his soul. From the death of such a man, thousands of men are born into a newness of life; and now that we are far away from the hurly-burly of politics and slogans, let us seriously contemplate the story of how Woodrow Wilson sought to do the right thing for Ireland in the right way at the psychological moment, just as Lincoln with almost uncanny forethought emblazoned the truth and right in words of enduring fame when he wrote his Emancipation Proclamation at a time when it was thought its effect upon the border States would be hurtful to the Union cause, although the fierce and ruthless opposition of certain members of his own Cabinet cried down Lincoln's statesmanship in this matter as being impotent, ineffective, and futile.

In connection with Woodrow Wilson's interest in Irish affairs and recalling the bitterness of opposition on the part of certain of our friends in this country, I remember an interesting conference as I sat in my room in a hotel in far-off Munich at a time when a tragical event in my own life (the serious illness of my oldest girl) two years ago brought me far across the seas. Across the table from me sat a man who at that time was and still continues to be a distinguished member of the Free States cabinet. As an ardent advocate of the Irish cause, he was recounting to me melancholy tales of the bloody civil war then rampant in Ireland and the hopes and prayers of Erin's sons that out of this melange would come a rebirth of freedom. He was recalling Gladstone's statement of 1890 when Gladstone said:

"I know of no blacker or fouler transaction in the history of man than the making of the union between England and Ireland."

The discussion ran its easy way along until finally we touched upon the much despised League of Nations, Ireland's entry into it, Wilson's advocacy of it, the opposition of Irish-Americans to it in the elections of 1920, and the guarantees of Ireland's freedom under the aegis of the League. It was surprising, my friends, to note the difference, the marked difference, in this Irishman's whole-souled, hearty advocacy of the League and the disparagement of it by some of the distinguished sons of Ireland in my own country. When I laid before this gentleman, now secretary of agriculture for the Free States, the opposition of America to Article X, which I called the "bloody angle" of the whole controversy in this country, he surprised me by saying that he and his associates in the Irish cabinet considered Article X the shield and armour of Ireland's grant of freedom. When I interrogated him as to what attitude the Free States cabinet would take toward entrance into the League of Nations, in high confidence he asserted that in a few months Ireland would apply for membership in the League. Paraphrasing Robert Emmet's words, he said, Ireland will then take her place among the nations of the world. This prediction uttered in my presence by Mr. Hogan, the Secretary of Agriculture for the Free States, was subsequently verified, for on September 30, 1923, an Irish delegation representing the Free State government appeared at Geneva, complied with all the conditions precedent to entrance into the League of Nations and, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the League, was admitted to membership, paying the sum of $40,000, the cost of admission therein, and agreeing to the plan of disarmament laid down in the council of the League.

"And, furthermore, my friends, we have the words of the Irish people themselves, as expressed editorially in that worthy champion of Irish independence, the Irish Statesman, that Ireland's entry into the league means not only freedom from injustice and domestic strife but an international renown and distinction that will place her on an equality with other great powers of the world.

"Admission of the Irish Free State to the League of Nations," says the Irish Statesman, "develops a sense of interdependence and human solidarity. Ireland's entry into the league constitutes international recognition of the status of the league, and Great Britain, by offering no opposition to Ireland's entry, thereby admits that Ireland can no longer be regarded merely as one of its domestic problems, and our disputes with it may lawfully be adjudicated upon by an international tribunal. Every such recognition helps the Free State morally; it helps to fix the position of Ireland among the nations of the world.

"The league will bring forth a spokesman for Ireland and the high-soul of the people like Lincoln in America, Massine in Italy, or Gladstone in England. . . .

"To be in the league is to have access to a knowledge the onlooker can never acquire, because only those engaged in movements can gauge truly the strength of the forces with or opposed to them. Nowhere else could Ireland learn the policy and motives animating other nations."

Therefore to-night there is a real cause for congratulation to lovers of freedom in Ireland. Peace, with all of its salutary benefits, now prevails there, and soon ultimate prosperity, contentment, and happiness will be realized. Thus 700 years of oppression, of tears, and of tragedy are at an end.

The only disparity of opinion between Woodrow Wilson and those who ardently advocated Ireland's freedom in this country was as to the method of approaching this great goal. It was the case of different men seeing the same thing in a different way and approaching a settlement of it from different angles. Woodrow Wilson, by reason of his trusteeship of a nation and his responsibility to a world that was torn and littered by the results of war, could not be a free-lance, a knight-errant. "Enthusiasm is good material for the orator, but the statesman must have something more durable to work with." His leadership in this matter was embarrassed by delicate diplomatic precedents, which to a great extent governed his conduct. He did not feel free himself openly to espouse the cause of Ireland, for to have done so might have added difficulties to an already chaotic world situation. As a distinguished American essayist said:

"The course of a great statesman resembles that of navigable rivers, avoiding immovable obstacles with noble bends of concession, seeking the broad levels of opinion on which men soonest settle and longest dwell, following and marking the almost imperceptible slopes of national tendency, yet always aiming at direct advances."

Long before the outbreak of the European war Woodrow Wilson discussed with me the Irish question, not indifferently, but with deep and fervent passion. "The faith that he had in the cause of Ireland wore well and held its colors in all weathers, because it was woven of conviction and set with the sharp mordant of experience." He was of the opinion that the Irish problem could not be settled by force and that the spirit of Ireland, which for centuries has been demanding justice, was unconquerable. In his opinion, force and the use of machine guns "merely ignite the powder" and bring only resentment. Shaking his head as if he despaired of settlement, Woodrow Wilson said, "European statesmen must be taught that humanity can be welded together only by love, by sympathy, and by justice, and not by jealousy and hatred."

Woodrow Wilson was certain that the failure of the English to find an adjustment of the Irish question was intensifying feeling not only in our country but throughout the world, and that the agitation for a settlement would spread like a contagion and would inevitably result in a great international crisis.

Discussing the Irish question with a member of the English Parliament before the war, he said, "Go home and settle the Irish question and there will be no doubt as to where America will stand." "Faith on the part of Great Britain," he said, "in the deep humanity and inherent generosity of the Irish people is the only spiritual force that will ever lead to a settlement of this question." He tried to impress this upon the Englishman with whom he discussed the matter. To Mr. Balfour he said:

"There never can be a real comradeship between America and England until this issue is definitely settled and out of the way."

In the New Brunswick speech to which I have adverted, he plainly indicated that his plan for the settlement of the Irish question was the establishment of some world forum to which the cause of Ireland might be submitted, where the full force of public opinion of the world, including the United States, could be brought into full play in a vigorous and wholehearted insistence upon a solution of this disturbing question.

Sir Edward Carson, leader of the Unionist forces in the British Parliament, said, in a statement carried in the American press, that "in the event of this proposed settlement being thrust upon us, we solemnly and mutually pledge ourselves not to recognize its authority. I do not care twopence whether this is treason or not."

Discussing Carson's utterance, the President said:

"I would like to be in Mr. Asquith's place. I would show this rebel whether he would recognize the authority of the Government or flout it. He ought to be hanged for treason. If Asquith does not call this gentleman's bluff the contagion of unrest and rebellion in Ireland will spread until only a major operation will save the Empire. Dallying with gentlemen of this kind who openly advocate revolution will only add to the difficulties. If those in authority in England will only act firmly now their difficulties will be lessened. A little of the firmness and courage of Andrew Jackson would force a settlement of the Irish question right now."

The President did not agree with the enthusiastic friends of Irish freedom in America that coercive methods put upon England through the instrumentality of the United States could accomplish anything. When he left for the other side to take part in the Peace Conference the future of Ireland was much in his thoughts. Indeed, the last conversation I had with him on board the George Washington was on this very vital question. But his solution of the problem lay in the establishment of a forum under the League of Nations before which not only the cause of Ireland but the cause of any oppressed people might be brought to the judgment of mankind.

The following two communications from the President when he was in Paris show his interest in the Irish question:

DEAR TOWNLEY: Confidentially (for I beg that you will be careful not to speak of or intimate this) I have been doing a number of things about this [the Irish question] which I hope may bear fruit.

THE PRESIDENT.

DEAR TOWNLEY: You are right about Mr. Crimmins having been a good friend, but I don't like to write any letters on this subject at present. I would appreciate it very much if you would assure him of my interest and of your knowledge of the fact that I am showing in every way I possibly can my sympathy with the claim of Ireland for home rule.

THE PRESIDENT.

On December 3, 1919, Bishop Shanahan, of the Catholic University, addressed a letter to the President in behalf of the rector and faculties of the Catholic University of America with reference to the question of home rule, to which the President replied:

DECEMBER 3, 1919.

MY DEAR BISHOP SHANAHAN: Allow me to acknowledge your letter of November 30, written in behalf of the rector and faculties of the Catholic University of America, and to say that it will be my endeavor in regard to every question which arises before the Peace Conference to do my utmost to bring about the realization of the principles to which your letter refers. The difficulties and delicacy of the task are very great, and I can not confidently forecast what I can do. I can only say that I shall be watchful of every opportunity to insist upon the principles I have enunciated.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

On December 3, 1919, he addressed a letter to Senator THOMAS J. WALSH as follows:

DECEMBER 3, 1919.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I appreciate the importance of a proper solution of the Irish question and thank you for the suggestions of your letter of yesterday. Until I get on the other side and find my footing in delicate matters of this sort I can not forecast with any degree of confidence what influence I can exercise, but you may be sure that I shall keep this important interest in mind and shall use my influence at every opportunity to bring about a just and satisfactory solution.

"I greatly value the expressions of your confidence and feel very much strengthened by them.

"With best wishes,

"Cordially and sincerely yours, "WOODROW WILSON."

While the President was in Paris I constantly kept him in touch with the situation in this country. That he was interested in bringing to the attention of the Peace Conference the cause of Ireland was evidenced by the cables that were exchanged between us.

It was Woodrow Wilson's hope that when the League of Nations was established the hopes of Ireland would be realized.

This is evidenced by the following cable which he sent to me under date of June 27, 1919:

"TUMULT, Washington:

"I entirely agree with the general tenor of your cable of the 25th about the Irish question, and I firmly believe when the League of Nations is once organized it will afford a forum not now available for bringing the opinion of the world and of the United States in particular to bear on just such problems.

"WOODROW WILSON."

Of course, the thing which lay close to Woodrow Wilson's heart was should consent to the establishment of a league as a part of a world the setting up of the League of Nations. Unless England and France settlement, any solution of the Irish question through the influence of world opinion was not in the reckoning. The wise, prudent thing, therefore, to do was first to establish a world court before which the cause of any oppressed peoples might be brought. This is just what he had in mind and what he succeeded in doing. To have thrust a settlement of Ireland's affairs into the foreground of the Peace Conference and to have made it a sine qua non would have been futile and foolish and might have resulted in disaster. Unfortunately, the friends of Irish freedom, deprecating and bitterly resenting well-considered methods like this, were desirous of having the matter thrust into the early conferences at Paris. The President knew that England would never consent to this and would resent any attempt on his part to carry out this idea. If the President had done so, England would undoubtedly have withdrawn from the conference, and thus the great cause of the League of Nations, which formed the foundation stone upon which the armistice was based, would have gone by the board. The President was looking far beyond a mere recognition of the Irish Republic. He was seeking to accomplish its security and guarantee its permanency through the instrumentality of a world court like the League of Nations. What would it have availed Ireland to have been granted dominion government or independence unless contemporaneously with the grant there was set up an instrumentality that would guarantee and protect it? The only thing upon which the Peace Conference functioned was the settlement of the affairs of those nations affected by the war.

Why didn't Wilson bring Ireland's cause to the attention of the Peace Conference? was the query which frequently reached us at the White House. The President in his western speeches discussed this matter in the following way:

"It was not within the privilege of the conference of peace to act upon the right of self-determination of any peoples, except those which had been included in the territories of the defeated empires—that is to say, it was not then within their power—but the moment the covenant of the League of Nations is adopted it becomes their right. If the desire for self-determination of any people in the world is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations, it becomes the business of the league; it becomes the right of any member of the league to call attention to it; it becomes the function of the league to bring the whole process of the opinion of the world to bear upon that very matter.

"Article XI is the favorite article in the treaty, so far as I am concerned. It says that every matter which is likely to affect the peace of the world is everybody's business; that it shall be the friendly right of any nation to call attention of the league to anything that is likely to affect the peace of the world or the good understanding between nations, upon which the peace of the world depends, whether that matter immediately concerns the nation drawing attention to it or not. In other words, at present we have to mind our own business under the rules of diplomacy and established custom. Under the covenant of the League of Nations we can mind other people's business, and anything that affects the peace of the world, whether we are parties to it or not, can, by our delegates, be brought to the attention of mankind. We can force a nation on the other side of the globe to bring to that bar of mankind any wrong that is afoot in that part of the world which is likely to affect the good understanding between nations, and we can oblige them to show cause why it should not be remedied.

There is not an oppressed people in the world which can not henceforth get a hearing at that forum, and you know what a hearing will mean if the cause of those people is just. The one thing that those doing injustice have most reason to dread is publicity and discussion. At present what is the state of international law and understanding? No nation has the right to call attention to anything that does not directly affect its own affairs. If it does, it can not only be told to mind its own business but it risks the cordial relationship between itself and the nation whose affairs it draws under discussion, whereas under Article XI, which I had the honor of advocating, the very sensible provision is made that the peace of the world transcends all the susceptibilities of nations and governments, and that they are obliged to consent to discuss and explain anything which does affect the good understanding between nations."

The friends of Ireland in this country have often asked me the question, "Would Woodrow Wilson have intervened in behalf of Ireland?"

I can answer this question only by saying that Ireland has never had a truer friend than Woodrow Wilson. From the day that we went to war, it was his steadfast purpose to induce the Government of England to settle the Irish question justly and permanently.

When I think of Woodrow Wilson, I have often compared him to the character of the prime minister discussed by Israel Zangwill in his book, The Mantle of Elijah. These lines, in my opinion, draw a perfect picture of Woodrow Wilson.

Speaking of Allegro's father, Zangwill said:

"With him freedom was no nebulous figure, aureoled with shining rhetoric, blowing her own trumpet, but free trade, free speech, free education. His millennium was earthly, human; his philosophy sunny, untroubled by Dantesque depths or shadows; his campaign unarmorial, constitutional, a frank focusing of the new forces emergent from the slow dissolution of feudalism and the rapid growth of a modern world. Toward such a man the House of Commons had an uneasy hostility. He did not play the game. Whig and Tory, yellow and blue, the immemorial shuffling of cabinet cards, the tricks and honors—he seemed to live outside them all. He was no clubman in 'The best club in England.' He was not bounded by the walls of the chamber nor ruled from the speaker's chair; the house was resentfully conscious it had no final word over his reputation or his influence. He stood for something outside it, something outside himself, something large, vague, turbulent, untried, unplumbed, unknown—the people."

We are under fire, gentlemen. We are suspected by certain insignificant groups in the country who foolishly think we are plotting against America and her well-being. They forget that there is not a battle field in America that has not been saturated with the blood of our sons; that, though the pressure of the tyranny of centuries is upon us, we still cling to the faith of our fathers. That faith and reverence for everything American now holds us steady in the midst of the storm. We Irish have one delightful characteristic—we are able to smile through our tears and laugh to scorn the criticism of those little men, those provincials, whose eyes never sweep the great horizons.

English oppression and tyranny drove us away from the Green Isle across the sea with the result that America and the world have been flowered by the genius of Irishmen, whose love of America and everything that affects her destiny will some day be utilized to save and protect her in case adversity from within or without shall threaten her. America neither doubts our honor nor questions our loyalty; nor shall we ever be unready when the great call shall come to vindicate America's conceptions of liberty and freedom upon any battlefield of the world.

Woodrow Wilson dared with courage and solemnity to do what he believed to be the right thing for Ireland. I believe that the torch of self-determination which he held high will by his death be again relighted to illumine and warm the world and thus point the way to the ultimate freedom of those people whose limbs are held by the shackles of unjust and tyrannical government.

The following lines visualize the poise, the quietude, the serenity of Woodrow Wilson "as he approached the guardian of the gate on his way out of the mighty city, whose towers are loftier than the pillars of smoke and the mountain peaks in the sky":

"Peace and plenty be with thee forever, keeper of the gate," said he, touching with two fingers of his right hand his bowed forehead.

"God walk before thy feet forevermore, stranger," answered the keeper of the gate. "Whither goest thou?"

"Wherever men are and the highroads lead. For the wisdom I seek does not remain in one place. It beckons and I follow, keeper of the gate."

"Hast thou found any wisdom in our city, stranger?"

"Aye, much wisdom have I found and great knowledge for the wayfarer who seeks a home to rest in his old age. My home is farther on the road, keeper of the gate."

"Who told thee that thy home is not in our city, stranger?"

"The man ye crucified yesterday. He cried not, nor did he weep nor curse as such men do, but he smiled and he smiled and he looked at me strangely, oh, so strangely!"

"Then my knowledge goes not further, keeper of the gate. I beg of thee to tell me outright why ye crucified him, if thou wouldst teach a poor wayfarer who is seeking after wisdom."

"Aye, I will tell thee, stranger, though thy curiosity is great for a walker of Caesar's roads. It was not because of any of these things, but because of all these things, because he said and did them all at once and because he talked too much and was beginning to be heard and because . . . But whither art thou going, stranger?"

"Where the highroad leads, keeper of the gate."

GERMAN RELIEF RESOLUTION.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject under discussion to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I will vote for this resolution authorizing the President to expend a sum not exceeding $10,000,000 for the purchase and distribution of grains, fats, milk, and other foodstuffs, for the relief of distressed and starving women and children of Germany. I feel that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should be adopted, providing that in the purchase of these materials preference should be given American farmers and cooperative farm associations. The middleman and profiteer must be eliminated.

The great World War is over. No causes and incidents should be forgotten. Each belligerent nation should naturally mourn the loss of the flower of its manhood, and build up its economic and social system upon a basis for the prevention of future wars—universal and lasting peace among nations.

We have not now and never had any quarrel with the German people. It was their government which had misled that great people, and it had to be subdued and eliminated. And now that Germany has established a republic, deriving its powers from the consent of the governed, it is our duty to see that hunger does not breed eternal hatred for all those who participated against her in the great conflict.

For four years the most perfectly organized governmental and military machine held at bay practically all the nations of the world. Germany showed the world organization to the nth degree. Prior to that time our students had sat at the feet of her philosophers, scientists, and artists, and had brought here the product of the skill of her people. But to-day, through no fault of her people, because her rulers had fallen out with other rulers, she lies prostrate at the feet of modern civilization. Two million five hundred thousand children are starving there now. Among her school children there is ten times the former tuberculosis rate. One-third her population, or 20,000,000 people, are in need of some form of relief. In large areas of Berlin more than 50 per cent of the children are tubercular—weak from undernourishment. There is less than 50 per cent of the amount of milk necessary to supply their needs, and they are entirely without fuel with which to warm their homes. We did not fight women and children and they are not responsible for their present condition. Many of these starving children were born since the war, and now, with the real wealth of the world within our borders, shall we sit idly by and permit a conquered foe to die of starvation and breed into continental European minds eternal hatred for American example?

America must have Germany on her feet as well as all the nations of Europe before we can prosper. I am mindful of the fact that this administration has no foreign policy; that our Government has been shaken to its foundations by the revelation of fraud and corruption practiced by those in public places in this administration. We hear of millions of dollars passing illegally from the Public Treasury, and yet there are those who deny a comparatively small sum for charity.

Let us act now, while starvation is upon this great people. Let the word go out that America regards the war as ended; that she wants a strong, upstanding Germany, with nourished, strong, and healthy children for the next generation, with whom commercial relations will be maintained.

There are many thousands of people of German extraction among our citizenship. In my veins flows the blood of Germany, mixed profusely with a French and Belgian strain. My people came over before the Revolution, fresh from the valleys of Germany, France, and Belgium; hence I may be expected to approach this question impartially. There is an insistent desire on the part of thousands of our citizens that their former countrymen be assisted, not for a selfish motive but that peace and good will may again prevail. And we can not attach improper motives to such a desire, for, as the poet has said:

Breathes there the man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said:
This is my own, my native land.

Whose heart has ne'er within him burned
As home his footsteps he hath turned

From wandering on a foreign strand.
If such there breathe, go, mark him well;
For him no minstrel raptures swell;
High though his titles, proud his name,
Boundless his wealth as wish can claim—
Despite those titles, power, and self,
The wretch, concentered all in self,
Living, shall forfeit fair renown,
And, doubly dying, shall go down
To the vile dust from whence he sprung,
Unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

This $10,000,000 will prove one of the best investments ever made by our people. Although a gift, the gratitude of the German people will always be displayed, and the money will be "bread cast upon the waters, to return a thousandfold."

When the new Germany assumes her place among the nations, when her people are fed and prosperous, future commercial and diplomatic relations will be predicated upon the fact that in her hour of need Germany's women and children were ministered to by an erstwhile foe, the good Samaritan, who eliminated malice and "with charity for all" bound up the wounds made by a conflict which has passed into history.

Mr. Chairman, I do not base my support of this resolution upon a desire for future commercial gain. God knows it will be a century before Europe is stabilized if the attitude of this administration is followed. But I want to see Germany and all Europe saved from Bolshevism. Hunger breeds madness, and my great fear is that this administration will procrastinate until the peoples of Europe, crazed by starvation, will cast aside their leaders and governments which can not bring them safety and prosperity, and resort to the law of self-preservation. Then, indeed, we will have a problem on our hands great enough to attend the efforts of all the people of the world, with civilization itself in the balance.

The question of the power to make this appropriation under the Constitution does not worry me. We can "promote the general welfare" and "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Our greatest statesmen in the days of Jefferson, Madison, Adams, Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, some of them fresh from the constitutional conventions and later debates, made similar appropriations without question, and we have the custom and usage established throughout a century of legislation, dispensing charity to Venezuela, Italy, Martinique, and Poland. Let us not hesitate in this enlightened day to show our Christian citizenship and raise our fallen foe, that she may help herself to a just and lasting place among the nations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KENT. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record on the inflation of the currency in 1920 and 1921 and to extend my remarks further by inserting an editorial of the Carbon Citizen on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a certain editorial. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object. Mr. Speaker, I do not like to object on an occasion like this, but a number of gentlemen on this side and also a number on that side have made it a practice to object to the insertion of newspaper editorials, and I feel constrained to object now.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record relative to the adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Again reserving the right to object, I regret very much that this unpleasant duty should be imposed upon me. I wish the gentleman would reserve his request until to-morrow. Objections to such requests have heretofore been made.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, seeing that we have had considerable logrolling on the adjusted compensation bill, I will not withdraw my request, but will leave it to anybody who opposes my request to extend my remarks to make objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall object this evening. Possibly I shall not object again.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] may extend his remarks on the German relief bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in reference to the German relief bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DUPLICATE BONDS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on House Resolution No. 231, passed this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on House Resolution 231. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, on the 27th day of February last before a joint session of the House and Senate the Hon. Charles E. Hughes delivered a most eloquent and touching eulogy upon the life and services of the late Warren G. Harding. Among other things he said of the dead President, "But, above all, we give the tribute of the deep affection which moves us to speak in tender remembrance of a generous and kindly spirit who counted human fellowship more precious than all the pomp and circumstance of power." How masterfully and in an almost personal way did he develop the principal traits of his subject! Above all, one could see the late President Harding as a careful, conscientious man, a man who stood for justice to all men, and a man who would not act until he was certain he possessed all the facts, the last man who would pursue an unfair or unjust course toward a fellow man. An avoidance on his part of injuring or offending any fellow man was his constant endeavor. Keeping this fine character in mind, one may easily see that when on the 31st day of March, 1922, he took a sudden and dramatic stand and with one stroke cut off "for the good of the service," as he said, 28 employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, he must have had a sufficient reason for such action, and no presumption can be indulged in that he acted through mere whim. His nature did not so proceed. As one "who had been so clear in his great office," his sense of fairness bravely rose, and for the good of the State he drew his sword and with one stroke, like the god Perseus, he severed the head of the gorgon Medusa.

His only answer to inquiries was "for the good of the service." What did he mean? What did he have in mind? At this time it is very easy for us to-day, in the light of the facts, to ascertain a part at least of what was in his mind that 31st day of March, 1922. No doubt he acted with his usual care, because we know now that he then knew that there had been divers and mysterious transferring of individuals, changing of regulations, limiting and moving of divisions in the Treasury, and that there had been particular and unheard-of confusion in the shifting, adjusting, and readjusting of those divisions of the Treasury which had to do with the inspection of surrendered bonds, commingled and simultaneous sleight-of-hand performances in the register's office, showing kaleidoscopic changes of persons as well as divisions who might inspect bonds.

He knew on that day that the long-established practice in the Treasury of audit checks for surrendered bonds had been in a most unexplainable manner abandoned.

Early in his administration the fact that duplicate bonds existed was known to him, and that this information had reached the Department of Justice as early as April, 1921. He knew also that Brewer as an attorney of the Department of Justice had in June, 1921, conversed with Mellon and sought him to stop the destruction of such duplicate bonds. He had received letters from some of the operatives in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing charging crookedness in that bureau. He had had high officials in the administration, who were also trusted friends, look into these charges. He knew at that time of the continued persistency of Secretary of the Treasury Mellon in his duplicate bond destruction campaign.

Evidently President Harding had endeavored to get at the duplicate bond matter himself in the various divisions of the Treasury quietly as he had the matters in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, no doubt afraid that an announcement of the existence of such bonds would affect the market value of all Liberty bonds. This he naturally wished to avoid.

Hamstrung, tied hand and foot, and surrounded, as he must have been, by the satellites, spies, sycophants of the Treasury ring, he finally, in despair, drew his sword and struck the blow that cleaved the snaky head of Medusa; but it seems that Perseus flew with her bleeding head over the hot sands of Africa while every drop of blood falling therefrom developed into a snake, and so multiplied that for centuries adventurers would not go there.

So Harding, having severed, as he thought, the head of the trouble, or at least produced a terrific blow upon the body of the offending department, soon found that every drop of blood he spilled multiplied and magnified the number and venom of those who opposed his efforts.

Even a President of the United States could not prevail against a Treasury ring which, organized in the time of Franklin MacVeagh, in the year of our Lord 1922 dominated completely the personnel and policy of the United States Treasury Department.

The President therefore called to his assistance an attorney of the Department of Justice, who had performed long and faithful service there, Mr. Charles B. Brewer. The President, having already learned of Brewer's work in the Department of Justice on duplicate bonds, called him to the White House on April 18, 1922, and informed him that he, the President, had personally taken charge of the whole situation regarding the duplication of bonds, and he instructed Brewer—and these are his own words—"to go out and get the truth, and if there are any blocks put in your way, let me know."

Thus was Brewer made a confidential and trusted agent of the President, and he had and held that great confidence of the President until the latter's death in August, 1923.

Blocks had been put in Brewer's way and on more than one occasion President Harding had removed them. During the long period of abuse heaped upon Brewer no one has had the effrontery to lodge a charge against his honor or against his ability as a lawyer and as an investigator. Some individuals, apparently fearful of possible disclosure of their wrongdoings, began at once a whispered propaganda against Brewer for the purpose of discrediting him with President Harding, which was of no effect however, and it is related that one day, when the President, Mr. Mellon, and others were present, including Mr. Brewer, that the President turned to his Secretary of the Treasury and said, "Mellon, they call this man a nut. It takes a nut to bring me such things as you see there," pointing to a large pile of duplicate bonds spread before them. He continued, "They are after this man good and hard, and I do not intend to let a thing happen to him." To which statement the Secretary of the Treasury made no response, but nodded his assent; but the Mephistopheles of the administration used no spoken word.

After the President's death the nut propagandists became very numerous and very loud. All along the line one could hear their voices, particularly whenever they thought they had found some breach in Mr. Brewer's proofs. They cried, "He is a nut! He is a nut! He is a nut!" in the Department of Justice, about the Treasury. Everywhere he went one could hear the whisper or the cry, "He is a nut!" "They say he is a kind of a nut!" It was whispered to Coolidge; it was whispered about the corridors and purviews of the Capitol and passed about in the cloakrooms; the resolution in question being introduced, it was whispered to the Speaker and to the chairman of the Rules Committee. Everywhere was heard the chirpings of the acolytes, "He is a nut! He is a nut! He is a nut!" until the sounds seemed to resemble a million of katydids in the forest on a hot, clear August night, continually declaring, "He is a nut! He is a nut! He is a nut!"

The truth being that a more modest, intelligent man does not live. An honest and reliable lawyer who takes the position that while he is in its employ he is acting as attorney for the Government and not against it.

Of course, such a campaign of abuse was only indulged in to discredit his work and to minimize the effect of what was about to occur—the filing of his final report, which would have been delivered personally to President Harding, had he been alive to receive it.

The very next day after the discharge of the 28 employees the Department of Justice, with a party of auditors who were also bank examiners, marched down to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the purpose of making an audit. About the same time a committee was appointed in the Treasury which also marched down to the same bureau, and in July made a report whitewashing the whole affair and declaring that no irregularities of any character existed, and found that the differences in the accounts were of no consequence, and the report of the ancient and honorable auditors from the Department of Justice was of a similar nature—a perfect whitewash. The rings in both departments were then certainly cooperative in the cover-up program, and all of this in the face of an ignored President, whom they defied. Why should they care? Presidents come and Presidents go, but the rings go on forever.

Mind you, the President was nevertheless busy in the work of going to the bottom of the affair himself, and then and there his confidential agent, Mr. Brewer, was making his first report to the President.

Brewer continued his investigation. It became necessary for him to go to various banking houses and to the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. On the last Sunday in December, 1922, a meeting was called at the private office of the President on the second floor of the White House by President Harding, a meeting which is bound to become celebrated in history.

The purpose for which it was called, when the overburdened President planned it two months before, was to show to Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and Attorney General Daugherty the proofs which had been disclosed to the President of the United States having to do with the matters subject to investigation by the President and his assistant, Mr. Brewer. There were also present S. Parker Gilbert, Undersecretary of the Treasury; W. H. Broughton, commissioner of the public debt; Elliott Wadsworth, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; William H. Moran, Chief of the Secret Service of the Treasury; and Mr. Brewer, who then exhibited the proof of the duplication of bonds and the further evidence that the numbering could not in any way be made by the machine repeating, because the said numerals on the duplicate bonds were of type of different fonts, all of which proof Mr. Brewer had before disclosed to the President. Mr. Brewer showed those present that he had secured impressions from every numbering block then in use in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing or which had been used during the printing of Liberty bonds, and that the figures on some of the bonds had not been made from any numbering blocks in the possession of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The cover-up policy right in the teeth of the President's efforts to unearth the truth immediately after this meeting began to increase and become more subtle and dangerous.

Although this was necessarily a confidential meeting, yet there were enemies of the President there, for within less than two months the representatives of the bureaus and the misinterpreters of the President and his motives began to insert their articles in the Washington papers. Not only was the cover-up squad kept busy but the contingent of confusion, misrepresentation, and falsehood appeared in its best working form.

Instead of reporting the real purpose of this meeting, it was given out that the meeting was held for the express purpose of calling Brewer to task, with the further statement that he had failed to produce proof in support of his claim that bonds had been duplicated and that the numbers on the duplicate bonds were not due to the mechanical errors of the numbering machine. All of these statements and articles were falsehoods pure and simple. One piece of documentary evidence and proof in existence which proves conclusively that no such thought existed of putting Brewer to task at that meeting on December 30, 1923, is a letter written to Mr. Brewer by the President within four days after that memorable meeting.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 4, 1923.

MR. CHARLES B. BREWER,

Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BREWER: I am inclosing you herewith a request which I have from the Attorney General for service at your hands. I am very much disposed to oblige the Attorney General in this matter. He has come to have a high regard for your services and he feels that you can be of very great assistance in a matter of deep concern to the Department of Justice. I trust this request will find you so situated that you can give him the service requested without serious interference with the important work you have in hand. I suggest that you report to General Daugherty personally.

Very truly yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

This letter shows that the President was pleased with Brewer's work and was for giving him more power, as he said at their first meeting, "Go out and get the truth, and if there are any blocks put in your way let me know"; and so this propaganda against Brewer and his efforts to carry on and complete President Harding's work in regard to his investigation as to the duplication of bonds has not only been misrepresented by false articles inserted in the newspapers, not only blocks but mountains of opposition have been put in his way, one department having spent many thousands of dollars in obstruction and cover-up work. That there was a conspiracy both in the Department of Justice and in the Treasury among officials of both, as exercised by and through the influence of their organized rings, to discredit not only Brewer but the late Warren G. Harding, President of the United States, in his endeavors to protect and save the taxpayers of the United States from the loss of revenue to the Government as a result of these duplicate-bond frauds, there can be no doubt.

That his persistency and determination to go to the bottom of the affair, even into the very rendezvous of the master whose Machiavellian mind originated and directed the game sinister of duplicating and distributing $10,000,000 of fraudulent Liberty bonds, made him secret, silent, powerful, resourceful, and relentless enemies, there can be no doubt. How far they were willing to go one can only judge by the extremes to which they have been willing to go since his death, which tortuous activities indicate that their resources and organization was not exceeded by the effectiveness of that celebrated and remorseless ring operated by Cesare Borgia in the fifteenth century; however—

Duncan is in his grave;
After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.
Treason has done his worst; nor steel, nor poison,
Malice domestic, foreign levy, nothing
Can touch him further.

Practically at every turn of this presidential investigation Mr. Brewer, in his efforts to secure for his chief the evidence he sought, was interfered with, hindered, delayed, and distracted by certain officials of the United States Government who should have assisted him in his effort. To such an extent was this carried on that it became necessary for Mr. Harding to give him a further letter to aid him in seeking the truth, which he did on June 30, 1922.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 30, 1922.

MR. CHARLES B. BREWER,

Special Assistant to the Attorney General,

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BREWER: It is well understood throughout the Treasury Department and by Secretary Mellon that you are to be permitted to secure all information you desire in making the investigations which have been committed to you. The presentation of this letter to any concern dealing with the Government or with the department will undoubtedly make available to you all necessary opportunity for investigation. If these credentials are not ample please report to me the specific case and a special order will be issued.

Very truly yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

Such action on the President's part was specifically necessary to overcome the efforts to thwart the investigation made by no less a person than Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Gilbert. This incident is illustrated in the following memorandum made by C. H. Hearst, assistant cashier of the division of securities:

NOVEMBER 2, 1922.

Mr. Charles B. Brewer, attorney of the Department of Justice, called at this office to-day, being introduced to Mrs. Turner, confidential clerk, by Mr. Warner in my absence and Mr. Ellis's absence. He asked for a date of shipment of bonds from New York in 1919, saying Mr. Mellon had authorized capital heads to permit him to examine records if accompanied by a representative of the division.

I telephoned Mr. Gilbert's office and Mr. Gilbert stated that Mr. Brewer's authority extended only to the public-debt service.

C. H. HEARST,

Assistant Chief, Division of Securities,
Office of the Treasurer of the United States.

The death of the good President removed the sole man who had the power and the willingness to push aside the blocks laid in Brewer's way. The effect was instantaneous. It was as though a gleeful shout arose, "Hurrah! The President is dead, and in his coffin. Now let us get Brewer without delay. He is getting too near his goal." It was necessary for Brewer to go to New York, Chicago, and San Francisco, and about a week after the President's funeral and while Brewer was in California, to wit, on August 18, 1923, the Attorney General wrote to Brewer as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 18, 1923.

CHARLES B. BREWER, Esq.,

Department of Justice.

(Addressed to College Park, Md.)

SIR: Your resignation as special assistant to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, is hereby requested, the same to take effect at the expiration of your accrued leave of absence.

Respectfully,

H. M. DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

It was addressed to his home at College Park, Md., when it was well known that he was in the West.

Again, on August 31, 1923, the Attorney General wrote another letter.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 31, 1923.

CHARLES B. BREWER, Esq.,
Department of Justice.

DEAR SIR: Your resignation as special assistant to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, is hereby requested, the same to take effect at the expiration of your accrued leave of absence.

Respectfully, H. M. DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

None of these were received until his arrival home, which was required of him while engaged in his important work by this telegram:

[Western Union telegram.]
WASHINGTON, D. C., September 11, 1923.

CHARLES B. BREWER,
Auditorium Hotel, Chicago, Ill.:
Return to department immediately.

DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

And again the following letter was received:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1923.

CHARLES B. BREWER, Esq.,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Under date of August 18, 1923, I wrote you requesting your resignation as Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, the same to take effect at the expiration of your accrued leave of absence.

No response having been received to such request, you are advised that your connection with the Department of Justice is hereby severed and your appointment as Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Department of Justice, is hereby canceled, the same to be effective at the close of business September 30, 1923.

Respectfully, H. M. DAUGHERTY, Attorney General.

It then became necessary to call the attention of the Hon. Calvin Coolidge, then President, to the matter, and he assigned Hon. Charles G. Washburn, a trusted friend, to hear and consider the same. Thereupon the Attorney General's order was revoked and Brewer directed to proceed and hand in his report by January 15, 1924, and on that date Brewer placed his report in the hands of Washburn.

One of the methods of hindrance of the investigation was the continual effort of Andrew Mellon to keep on with the destruction of the very bonds that would be necessary to prove whether or not they had been duplicated. Mellon said he would have it stopped. This was said June 27, 1921. He did not do so, but continued to destroy them until December 18, 1921, when it became necessary for President Harding himself to take Mr. Mellon in hand, as shown by the President's letter written next day. This letter was:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1921.
(Personal and confidential.)

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I talked with you this morning over the telephone about suspending the destruction of bonds which have been exchanged for new ones, etc., and was very greatly pleased to have your assurance that this destruction would be permanently suspended. I think this administration ought to take that course as the surest manner of self-defense.

These bonds will not require any very extended storage space, and we will have very valuable refutation of neglect on the part of this administration if these exchanged securities and other questionable cancellations are reserved for future reference and inspection.

I trust you will make the order a very explicit one and allow no variation therefrom.

Very sincerely, WARREN G. HARDING.

Nevertheless, the destruction of the valuable evidence was not stopped until April 22, 1922, and after the President had issued another letter on the subject.

When the House investigation of the truth of the whole matter began to appear on the horizon and the discussion of the elimination of the evidence of duplication by destruction of canceled bonds was received as an important factor by the membership of the House the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury began an argument in the newspapers that there was full authority of law to destroy canceled bonds. He set his lawyers to work on the matter, and after days of search they reported that they could find no such law, and Assistant Secretary Winston admitted that they had no authority, and now talk about resourcefulness—now something happened which nearly became a joke on the House. A great mass of coupons, which are absolutely necessary in tracing duplications, were very recently presented to the committee of this House on the disposition of useless executive papers, which I have been trained to think was an unimportant committee; and had it not been for a member of that committee from Kentucky, who objected, the humorous tragedy would have been enacted.

In constant fear of losing his bonds, in which the interests of the Government were vital and in which lay his own reputation, Brewer did as every honest man should, he fled to the people's sanctuary—Capitol Hill. I had known something of his work. Several weeks before he had exhibited some of the bonds to me. If they were taken from him, he wanted some one to prove that he had had them. I agreed to make an affidavit for him; but the Departments of Justice and the Treasury were bearing down upon him and his evidence. It seemed that to save him on his third time down he and his case must be given the publicity treatment.

The truth must be brought to light. I then called, haphazard, as I could reach them by telephone, 25 Members of this House, to whom in my office Brewer spoke and detailed his case. The result was a vote of confidence in Brewer and his claim. A volunteer organization was then perfected and an executive committee appointed, which volunteer organization can easily work in harmony, if necessary, with any regularly appointed committee of this House to obtain the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Later 10 members of this committee visited the safety vaults of the Union Trust Co. and saw, held in their hands, and examined several million dollars' worth of duplicated, uncanceled, or other bonds about which the records had been falsified which the special attorney and investigator for former President Harding had obtained.

While Brewer was endeavoring to make his final report he was subjected to all sorts of interruptions tending to annoy and delay him. For instance, at this time the Treasury Department demanded the taking of an inventory of the bonds in the possession of Brewer and necessary for the making up of this report, and this when the Treasury held individual receipts for every piece of paper he had, and efforts were made to secure his evidence to the extent that his private office was broken open under the orders of Cunningham, assistant to W. J. Burns, connected with the Department of Justice. His telephone lines were tapped, and Treasury sleuths followed him from place to place, and in the banks in San Francisco, where it was necessary to go, and even his room at his hotel was ransacked. Brewer was determined that he would protect his evidence and produce it where it would be available for the use of Congress or the grand jury, and when one Rush Holland, an employee of the Department of Justice, demanded that he turn over his evidence to the Undersecretary of the Treasury and deliver to him all the duplicate bonds and evidence in his possession, and appeared with a written demand from Andrew Mellon that the same be turned over to Winston, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Charles B. Brewer, at his own expense, employed a lawyer and applied to a local court as a citizen and taxpayer for an order protecting him in his possession of this evidence, which was necessary to exonerate the late President Harding and to protect his own reputation and honor and to prevent irreparable damage resulting to the people from the loss or destruction of the same.

Upon filing of the bill, Brewer turned over to me the keys to the safety boxes containing the bonds and other evidence for the benefit and use of the House of Representatives. The complainant, Brewer, on motion of the attorneys for the Department of Justice and the Treasury, was ordered to turn over his evidence to the defendants in order that they might make a case in defense. Brewer was threatened with contempt unless he turned the bonds over to the clerk of the court where the proceeding was pending, and I caused the keys to be turned over to the clerk on the express understanding that an inventory was made of the securities and a receipt given me for the same before any access was given to any other person.

And now the Treasury is attempting to get its hands on the exhibits and remove them from the court to the Treasury Building. These bonds represent the truth. If they were destroyed, accidentally, or otherwise, they would have no more force or effect than a dead witness who had ceased to talk. The dead tell no tales, and destroyed bonds speak no language. Such is the present status of these duplicate bonds.

Brewer prayed the court that the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department be enjoined from interfering with him in his possession of these Liberty bonds and other evidence and from interfering with his possession of the keys to the safety boxes containing the bonds and other evidence which he had turned over to said Member of Congress, and from destroying said bonds which were necessary to preserve in order to determine with certainty whether there were duplicates which had not as yet been surrendered, and from molesting, coercing, or in any way humiliating or embarrassing the persons in the employ of the Government who have been called upon to state what they know with reference to said Liberty bond issues, and their destruction. He further prayed the court that said injunction be made permanent until at least the United States grand jury could investigate and act upon such evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt about this resolution passing the House, and I realize that it could have been passed without argument, but for the benefit of the historical features of the case I thought it would not be amiss to put the foregoing into the Record.

The resolution may be a little weak and whey-faced; but with the statutes of the United States governing an investigation of this kind and with the promise of that able legislator from New York [Mr. SNELL], chairman of the Rules Committee, that if any further authority is needed to come back to him and it would be given, I am satisfied that when the committee is appointed it will have sufficient power granted it now or hereafter to thoroughly investigate the subject in question.

I predict for the committee which the Speaker in his wisdom may appoint a thorough, painstaking inquiry wherein no innocent man shall suffer and no guilty man shall escape.

There is one other word—a word of warning. Remember that though securities are printed in the Bureau of Engraving, they are issued, surrendered, and retired through other divisions of the Treasury. The opposition to this investigation has attempted from the beginning to keep the public mind centered on the Bureau of Engraving in order that it might not be remembered that other divisions of the Treasury have been accused of as many, if not more, irregularities than the engraving division; and also that the public might lose sight of the question of duplicate bonds—the real subject under investigation. This opposition attempted to use such a smoke screen on Members of Congress and failed. It has, however, been powerful enough to have a part of the press emphasize the Bureau of Engraving to the exclusion of the real subject. If the papers are read with this idea in mind, it is not difficult to recognize the ones affected. It is reflected in the tone and particularly in the headlines which oftentimes bear little resemblance to the text. Headlines generally form an interesting study and a tolerably accurate barometer of a journal's sincerity.

INVENTORY OF DUPLICATE AND IRREGULAR BONDS AND COUPONS AND OTHER SECURITIES OF THE LIBERTY LOAN ISSUES FORMERLY HELD IN TRUST FOR CHARLES B. BREWER, SPECIAL ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, BY CONGRESSMAN EDWARD J. KING, IN THE VAULTS OF THE UNION TRUST CO., AND BY EDWARD J. KING DELIVERED TO THE CLERK OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FEBRUARY 21, 1924, AND LOCKED IN THE VAULTS OF RIGGS NATIONAL BANK FOR SAFE-KEEPING.

[NOTE: Where the same number appears twice it means that both bonds are in existence; where only one number appears it usually means that the duplicate has been destroyed.]

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, am I right in understanding that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have the call on next Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes: I think so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have the call.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but they have nothing to present, as I understand.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Has the gentleman from Ohio any objection to postponing his request and make it apply to Calendar Wednesday of next week?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There are two very vitally important and rather contentious appropriation bills before the House, and I think it would be very advisable to dispose of them this week in order that we may take up the immigration bill next week.

The Committee on Appropriations thinks that if we can have this week, including Wednesday, we can pass both these bills I have referred to by Saturday. That would be postponing only by a week the time for the committee of which the gentleman from Maine is a member.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. There would be no intention to postpone Calendar Wednesday next week?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; there would be no such intention, so far as I know.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries has two bills on the calendar in which members are very much interested. The chairman is not here, and two members of the committee ranking me are absent. In the absence of the chairman I should not be inclined to object.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting an editorial upon Woodrow Wilson, written by Mr. Edwin B. Lambright, of Tampa, Fla., and a sonnet on Woodrow Wilson, written by Herbert Felkel, of St. Augustine, Fla. Mr. Lambright is one of the ablest editorial writers in the South.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman from Florida desires to interrupt the business of the House by making a request of that kind, I can not help it, but I can not make any agreement.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. The gentleman and I sometimes disagree, but on this occasion I have no objection to his request.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think I shall be compelled to object, because I have already objected to a similar request. The gentleman should not ask leave to extend his remarks pending a request such as I have made as to Calendar Wednesday, and make his consent to my request contingent upon my assent to his request.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Well, considering that the House has accomplished so much business, I have not objected and do not intend to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with this week?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make my request.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman puts me in a disagreeable position. Personally, I would not have any objection to his request to insert the editorial referred to; but, as I say—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. General permission was given many days ago for the extension of remarks in the Record by Members upon the late President Wilson. Of course, they are supposed to be their own remarks, and, as to this article, there is nothing of a partisan character in it. I do not believe that even the gentlemen who have been accustomed to object would object to this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to assure the gentleman it is not any personal question with me.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I realize the proprieties of the situation, and the gentleman from Florida does. But this is a tribute to Mr. Wilson without the slightest political significance. I do not believe that the gentlemen who have heretofore objected would object to this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I certainly would have no objection myself to anything of this sort. Of course, I have not seen the editorial; and it is only a question of the propriety of using the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which are much too congested now, for the expression of the views of newspaper writers and others instead of the views of the Members of the House. I would have no objection to the gentleman from Florida expressing his own views, of course.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. The only reason why I ask to print this article in the Record is because it expresses—perhaps better than I could—some tributes to Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman think he could have read it in the time we have already taken?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I thought, as the late President Wilson has passed to the great beyond, that perhaps a tribute might go into the Record.
